Have they forgotten the moment they realized the great playground was haunted?

Where did we get this idea that just because we can reproduce, we should?

I've never been much of an advocate for abstinence. Contraceptives are much less traumatic, but, one way or another, just think of the results of a movement to end the tradition of reproduction.

A drastic reduction in the population of reproducers would eventually cause schools, pediatricians, companies, stores, etc. to go out of business.

Where there are no children, there are no more starving children, no battered children, no laboring or slave children and no broken children.

The extinction of the human race may be the finish line, or at least the only way off the hook.

I don't want to be around when the defecation hits the fan, when the landfills are full, and the water is too toxic from greed to drink.

I don't want any of my offspring to have to inherit the environmental, social and economic disasters that have only been exacerbated by the indifference of my generation to our own inheritance.

The only conclusion I've been able to reach as to a viable solution to such cable-compartmentalized travesties as world hunger, pollution and crime is a revolt against reproduction.

As long as we are reproducing people, we are reproducing problems.

Sometimes my only consolation to the overwhelming grief of human suffering is that my stay here on this Earth is relatively short.

After hearing the CNN's St. Valentine's Day brief every half hour for five hours, it caught my attention that the oldest couple in America were responsible for the production of 14 kids, 33 grandchildren and 117 great-grandchildren.

Two people turned into 164, and this is a good thing?

I guess as long as they are white, heterosexual and not on welfare, this is commendable, according to the unspoken American standard.

Some people might grace this earth with no greater contribution other than to stop contaminating the collective gene pool with their DNA.

We are reluctant to come to terms with the idea that we might be the ones who shouldn't perpetuate our breed.

I am relieved I figured this out before it was too late, and in a time when birth control is accessible, not to mention when my worth as a woman isn't completely contingent on my status as a mother.

My only regret is that if mainly liberals are abstaining from reproduction this world may be left to the right, leaving a void of bleeding hearts, and then who will clean up after the right?

It is projected that the population will exceed 6 billion within the next decade.

That's almost 10 million more people who will be hungry and will need things like jobs.

They will need space in landfills and non-renewable fuel to pollute the air and water, which of course they will need more of.

Even if we doubled our current food supply to meet the population demands, death from starvation would still reach somewhere between 20- and 40-million people per year, and that's before these incoming 10-million bodies.

The world becomes less comfortable and less safe as we attempt to prolong our stay here.

Am I missing something?

APPIER SIDELINED BY BLISTER, WILL MISS OPENING DAY

▶ Kansas City Royals starter Kevin Appier, the projected opening day starter, will be sidelined for about three days with a blister on the big toe of his right foot. The blister developed Sunday as Appier threw batting practice. A hole in his sock was blamed for the blister.

Athletes, fans misrepresent sporting world by finicky show of fraudulant play, antics

The sporting world is full of frauds, and it is time they were exposed.

You see it in every sport — athletes who are all hype and little talent. They are overrated fakes, but still some fans will swear by them. It is time to let the truth be known.

VIEWPOINT

TODD STEWART

TODD STEWART is a junior in secondary education/English. You can e-mail comments to Todd at (toddvs@ksu.edu).

In the Big 12, Kansas guard Jerod Haase and Missouri forward Derek Grimm walk away with these honors easily.

As a shooting guard, Haase's jump shot is erratic at best. His point totals might at times be misleading, as most come from transition plays and layups. Haase is not a shooter. Case in point — see Haase's performance in last year's NCAA regional final loss to Syracuse. It is easy for fans to point to Haase as the reason Kansas did not advance to the Final Four, but of course, I would not do that.

> "Our fans here are so very finicky. There are only two conditions for fans to attend any sporting event — the team must either be winning, or it must be playing Kansas."

Grimm is a power forward by size, a shooting guard by skill. This contradiction leaves Grimm without a true position on the court and renders him useless. Grimm's lack of natural athletic ability does not allow him to make up for this difference.

In the ongoing search for a quarterback in Kansas City, two athletic frauds rise to the top.

Elvis Grbac is the next Steve Bono. (What more can you say?)

Chris Chandler is worse. He has spent two years as a starter, yes, but for a bad team. He could provide the Chiefs with stability as a backup signal-caller, but any attempts by the Chiefs to look for him to lead the team to the next level are naive. He is just not that good.

In pro basketball, the list could probably go on for pages and pages, but two are easy to point to.

Utah guard John Stockton is an umpteen-time all-Star and is the NBA's all-time assist leader, but what does he do that any other NBA point guard cannot do? Sure, his assist totals are mind-boggling, but that is because of the greatness of forward Karl Malone, who is on the finishing end of most of those passes.

The ability to pass the ball to a superior player does not make someone great. Anyone can do that. There has to be more to a player than that, and I would take a dozen other point guards in the NBA over Stockton.

Philadelphia guard Allen Iverson is on his way to stardom, but any attempt to label him a star at this stage is misguided.

Iverson is a flashy, exciting court leader for the 76ers, but his mistakes, more often than not, outweigh the positives. He makes so many turnovers and takes so many bad shots that even though he is a fan favorite, he is still a fraud as a basketball player. He has a long way to go.

Here at K-State, two misconceptions come to mind under the category of frauds.

The first is the statement of K-State as a football power.

As I have said before, in four years the Wildcats have not beaten a team they should not have. Every year K-State fans can pencil in a series of Ws surrounded by two Ls, one for Nebraska and one for Colorado.

For the Cats to make the jump to the next level, they must either break through against either the Cornhuskers or Buffaloes or schedule some tough out-of-conference games and prove the Cats are not just getting their nine wins each season against cream puffs and fakes.

And the second fraud is the assumption that K-State has a strong fan base.

Our fans here are so very finicky. There are only two conditions for fans to attend any sporting event — the team must either be winning, or it must be playing Kansas.

K-State faithfuls gave up on a basketball season in December.

They did this because it was the easy thing to do. Let's be honest — we don't care about the team, only winning. It is a sad state of affairs when our most faithful fans are alumni because students just don't care.

There it is — another fraud exposed, and that fraud is us.

Second-half run too much for Cats to match

JEREMY KELLEY

LAWRENCE — If college basketball games were decided in one half instead of two, K-State would have recorded the biggest upset of its season.

But there are two halves, and it was a phenomenal second half that gave Kansas the 78-58 win over its in-state rival.

Even more so, everything was pointed in favor of KU.

It was Senior Day, and emotions ran high as six seniors were showered with flowers before the start of the game. 16,300 fans came to Allen Fieldhouse on Saturday to witness the antics of such superstars as Jacque Vaughn, Scot Pollard, B.J. Williams and Jerod Haase.

"They're too emotional, and this is too big a day, and you're not going to catch them on a day like that," Coach Tom Asbury said.

However, K-State (9-15, 2-12) caught them in the first half off a 10-4 run to close the period at the last-placed team in the Big 12 found itself atop the No. 1 team in the country.

At the half, the unprecedented was revealed.

For the first time this year at home, KU was trailing at the half, 31-30, to a K-State team that had won just two of its past 15 games. The Cats dominated the boards and badgered the Hawks into a atrocious shooting performance, including 1-11 from behind the three-point line.

Senior center Gerald Eaker came alive against KU, chipping in eight points and grabbing eight points in the first half. But Eaker fizzled in the second half, finishing with 12 points and nine rebounds.

The unthinkable had occurred.

But then guess what happened.

Forward Raef LaFrentz' two free throws with 16 minutes, 5 seconds, put the Hawks up for good, 39-38, in the second half. Those shots capped an 8-0 run that would become a part of a 24-4 run over the next 8:57 as KU stretched its lead to 61-42.

"There's no weaknesses," guard Aaron Swartzendruber said. "They're two deep at every position. A great player goes out, and another great player comes in."

LaFrentz chipped in 10 points down that stretch, and Vaughn capped off the run by faking out guard Ayome May out and scoring a layup.

"They're just so good. You have to play a perfect game," Asbury said. "The effort was there, but the execution was not."

KU's big guys proved to be too much for the Cats to handle. LaFrentz scored 21 and grabbed 11 rebounds, the 32nd double-double of his career. K-State had no weapons to stop him.

"Yeah, defensively I need somebody that plays in a league that makes 6 million a year," Asbury said. "You're not going to stop him. Hell, he's a hell of a player. Big time."

Emotion-filled seniors, LaFrentz upend Cats' hopes for upset

LAWRENCE — Not afraid of the Phog or the fact that it was Senior Day, K-State went into Allen Fieldhouse and played better basketball than the No. 1 Kansas Jayhawks for the first half.

The 16,300 fans that showed up couldn't believe their beloved Hawks were actually down 31-30 at halftime. Down to a team that had just two wins in its previous 15 games.

"I was thinking, 'This is KU, and we are up by one point,' Wildcat center Gerald Eaker said. "But how much does that mean?"

It wouldn't mean much, as the Hawks would outscore K-State 48-27 in the second half, rolling to a 78-58 victory.

Game time was delayed as the six Hawk seniors were cheered and showered with carnations. The packed crowd was at its feet, and emotions were high.

But the Hawks would not come out smelling like roses for the first 20 minutes.

The Cats came out and out-hustled the Hawks, gaining an incredible 28-19 rebounding edge in the first half.

Eaker's rebound and put back at the 1:34 mark gave the Cats a 31-30 lead. On the Hawk's next possession, Eaker blocked a Raef LaFrentz shot to ensure the lead.

Eaker finished the half with eight points and eight rebounds. He finished the game with 12 points.

"Gerald hasn't played well against KU before. I think he is starting to see the sands in the hourglass winding down," Coach Tom Asbury said. "I think he just got going early and got some confidence. He started to think, 'Hey I can play with these guys.'

LaFrentz proved to be too much for the Cats in the second half as he led the Hawk comeback.

From the 16:05 mark of the second half until the 13:30 mark, the Hawk junior tallied 10 straight points. After being held to eight first half points, LaFrentz recorded 13 points in the second half.

"He's just a load. He could go in the lottery anytime he wanted to," Eaker said. "I haven't seen anyone who can stop him yet."

Cat forward Manny Dies echoed the same sentiments.

"He pretty much handled the load. He just took over in the second half. He's a very talented player," he said.

Asbury said he was pleased with the way the team handled the loud crowd and the atmosphere of Allen Fieldhouse.

"They could have just completely blown us out with the kind of emotion and crowd hype," he said. "On this day, especially with this group, they could absolutely devastate you. I thought our guys held in there and held our poise."

Fallible shooting destroys K-State women's chanc of 12th consecutive home win against Jayhawks

SUN DEE MILLS

K-State's 11-home game winning streak ended Saturday night at the hands of the Kansas Jayhawks. Before a record 9,736 fans, the Hawks defeated the Cats 62-46.

"It was a great win for us," Hawk coach Marian Washington said. "Kansas State has done an incredible job this season winning as much as they have at home. I want to commend them on a great season."

The Wildcats could never gain a lead. They came within four points, 16-12, at the 7:56 mark in the first half, off a three-point shot by guard Missy Decker. This was the 12th-consecutive game Decker hit a trey. It was the Cats' only trey of the game, as they went 1-15 from behind the arc.

"We knew they were one of seven from the three-point line at the half," Washington said. "We were trying to stay with that kind of pressure in the second half."

Cat coach Deb Patterson said the loss could be contributed to a combination of the Hawk defense and the lack of Cat offense.

"They ignited offensively, and we never got on track on the offensive end of the floor," Patterson said. "We weren't making individual plays within the framework of our offense."

After the four-point spread, the Hawks went on a nine-point run. The Cats ended the half nine points behind, 31-22.

Despite a strong beginning in the second half, the Cats couldn't muster an answer for Hawk guard Tameka Dixon.

"It got to the point where we threw the ball at A.J. (Andria Jones) and no matter what the situation, we tried to get a basket," Patterson said.

Unfortunately, that game plan didn't work for the Cats. Jones was six of 16 from the field, partially because of Dixon's defense.

"Dixon was on me a lot," Jones said. "She's very quick. It was tough to get the ball inside."

The Cats reached 33 points at the 13:47 mark off a charity shot by Jones, but Dixon racked up points on the KU side of the scoreboard. The Cats were scoreless for 10 minutes while Dixon and the Hawks added 13 points to their score.

Cats serve up win against Tulsa

SHANE MCCORMICK
sports writer

The K-State women's tennis team continued to roll in spring play, serving up a 6-3 win Friday night over Tulsa at Ahearn Field House.

The win was the fourth consecutive victory for the Wildcats, moving the team to 4-1 on the season. The Cats picked up four wins in singles and two in doubles.

At the No. 1 singles spot, sophomore Yana Dorodnova was involved in an interesting three-set match. Dorodnova flew by Morgan Briggs 6-0 in the first set. But in the second, Briggs returned the favor, winning the set 6-0. Dorodnova regained her first-set form and grabbed the third set, 6-1.

"I saw she won the first set pretty fast. Then it seemed like a couple minutes later, she lost the second," coach Steve Bietau said. "She just let that second set get away from her."

At the No. 2 spot, junior Lena Piliptchak cruised to a 6-0, 6-0 victory over Maria Andrea Montoya. Piliptchak put continued pressure on Montoya, painting the lines with winners.

"She forced some weak balls that open up possibilities for her," Bietau said. "She is really playing with a lot of confidence."

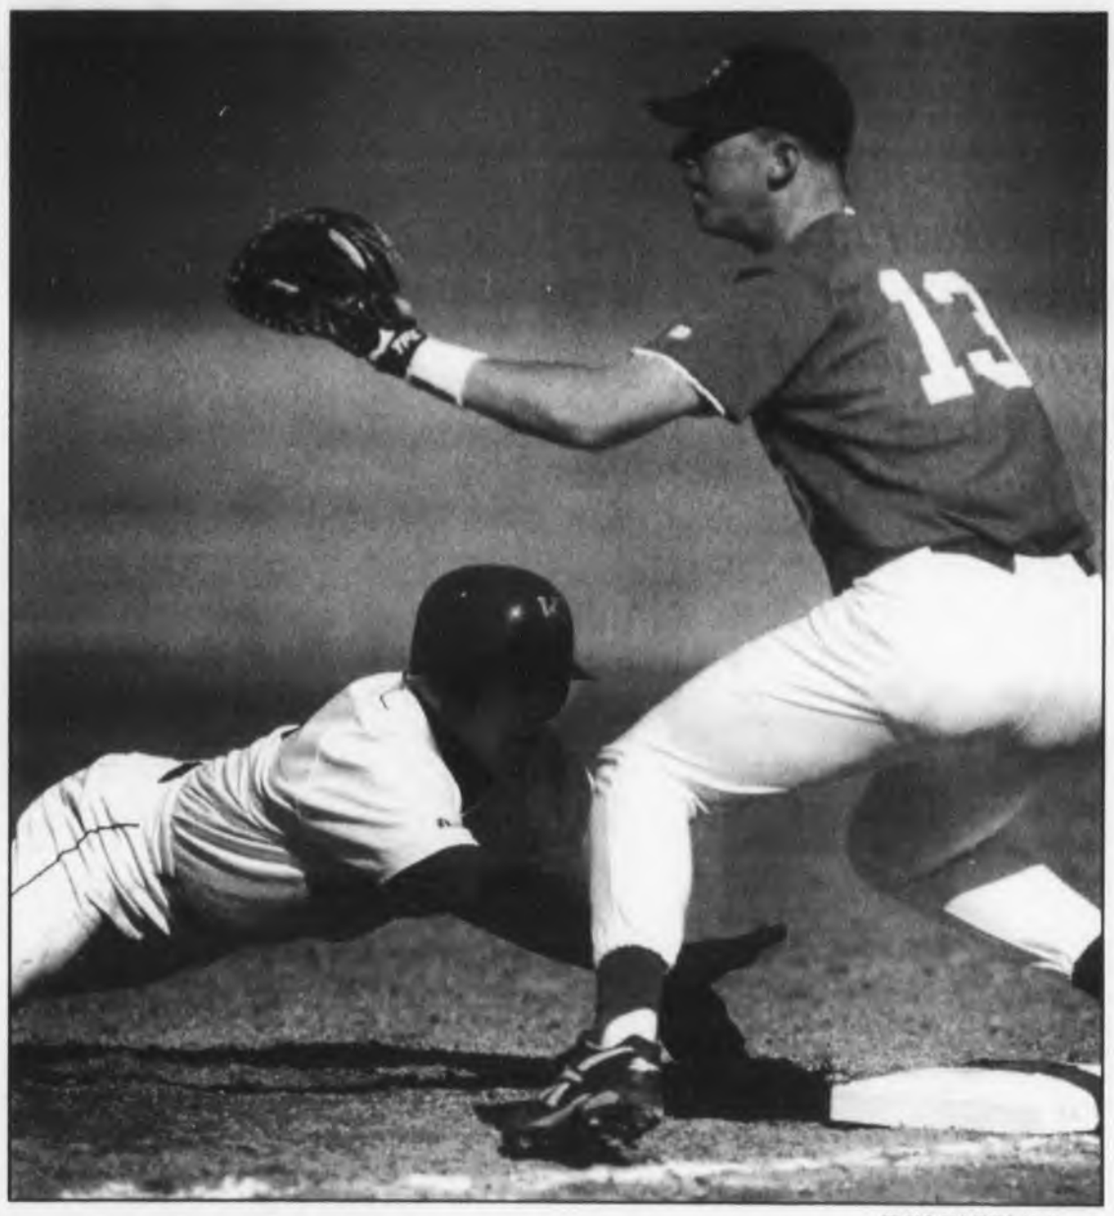
With the win, Piliptchak improved her singles record to 4-1. Also improving to 4-1 on the season was junior Chris Schulte.

Schulte, once again, finished off her opponent in straight sets, beating Tatiana Chtcherbakova 6-3, 6-2.

Junior Dinah Watson continued her spring comeback, beating Monica Poveda. Watson battled in the first set, taking the close set, 6-4. She breezed in the second, winning 6-1. Watson moved to 2-0 on the season since her return from a leg injury.

Junior Karen Nicholson lost in a tough three-set match to Tarryn Martin, 6-4, 3-6, 4-6. The loss was Nicholson's third of the season.

"Karen is not playing with a lot of confidence right now," Bietau said. "It is partly because she is not in great shape. She's been bothered by her foot and hasn't been able to put in a lot of quality work in.



"She is about a half step behind most of the time. It has been really tough for her to find her groove."

In doubles action, Dorodnova and Piliptchak improved their record to 4-1 on the season.

Playing at the No. 1 spot, the duo posted a convincing 8-2 win over Poveda and Briggs.

Watson and Schulte teamed up to pick up the other doubles victory, beating Teresa Baird and Chtcherbakova, 8-5. The win moved their record to 2-0 on the season.

The Cats will return to the courts March 1, when they open up Big 12 play against Texas Tech.

K-STATE'S ERIC SOMMERHAUSER dives back to first to avoid the pick-off by Air Force's Jared Frosch in the second inning Saturday at Frank Myers Field.

K-State wallops Air Force in weekend double header

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

In its first double header of the season, the K-State baseball team picked up two wins Saturday at Frank Myers Field against the Air Force Falcons, 11-8 and 6-5.

It was K-State's pitching staff that anchored two more home victories, recording 11 strikeouts and just five walks.

In the first game of a doubleheader, pitcher Jon Oiseth got the nod for the Wildcats. Oiseth recorded eight strikeouts but gave up seven runs in just 3.2 innings.

K-State, 5-1 fell behind 8-6 in the top of the sixth but gained ground on the Falcons as the Cats scored three runs in their half of the inning to take the lead for good.

Shortstop Heath Schesser and second baseman Todd Fereday combined for six RBI.

Fereday had just one hit in the game. Nonetheless, it was a big one as he dinked his first home run of the year. Schesser went 2-3 with two runs scored.

"As long as they can keep getting us runs, we'll be in good shape," Coach Mike Clark said.

Falcon pitcher Nate Tarkowski gave up two more runs in the eighth to account for the final tally.

In his third relief effort of the year, pitcher David Johnson picked up his third save of the year. Jason Wells also recorded his first win of the year.

Despite the win, Clark said he was disappointed because his players allowed Air Force to get a few runs in late innings.

"We can't have many more stinkers like that," he said. "We allowed them to get on us early, and they had no business doing that."

In the second game, K-State escaped with a narrow victory in what Clark called a great college baseball game.

The Cats again got on the Falcons early scoring four runs to begin the second contest.

Fresh off a shoulder surgery, pitcher Eric Yanz kept the base paths clear for Falcons tallying nine strikeouts in the game.

"Eric looked really good and did an outstanding job, and he set the tone for us where we were able to get on them early," Clark said.

The Falcons slowly chipped away at the Cats and notched the score at 6-4 heading into the ninth inning.

Clark again gave Johnson the nod to try to save the game, but it wasn't as easy as his first game. Johnson gave up a solo homer to the first batter that shrunk K-State's lead to 6-5. He then walked the outfielder, Derek Sawser, and the next batter advanced the runner to second.

The Falcons juiced the bases and were ahead in the count three balls, one strike when Johnson came from down in the count to strike out the Falcons and record his fourth save in four appearances for the Cats.

"You just go in and start trying to throw strikes, and sometimes it gets a little crazy," Johnson said. "But I guess you have to love it because it's baseball."

Clark on the other hand wasn't that fond of Johnson's antics in the ninth.

"I'm going to have to get Pepto-Bismol as a team sponsor or some other antacid tablets or something," he said. "He keeps things interesting, but when you need a pitch he's always there to make a pitch."

Yanz picked up his first win as K-State capped its first doubleheader with a tight game.

The third game of the series scheduled for Sunday was canceled because of cold weather. The game will not be rescheduled.

Patterson said playing passively led to problems for the Cats.

"We like to have more than one look at the basket," Patterson said. "When we did get the offensive look, we didn't take advantage of it."

Patterson said she agreed the Hawks were just a step quicker and a head taller than the Cats at every position.

"They were aggressive mentally as well as physically," Patterson said. "It didn't matter that they were on our court."

Decker and Jones said Dixon led the Hawks in terms of leadership and controlling the tempo of the game.

"Let's see — nine for 17 from the field, nine of 11 from the free-throw line, six rebounds and five assists — yep, she's pretty good," Jones said.

Although Jones and Decker said the loss put a damper on proving something about the K-State program, Patterson said the loss would inspire the team for the upcoming week.

"It makes it very easy to get up for our next game," Patterson said. "When we feel we didn't play well, it spurs us to compete, which we will do at Missouri."

Patterson said the disappointment she felt in losing the game and having the winning streak broken was disappointing for the fans as well.

"Having 9,700 people here was an overwhelming feeling," Patterson said. "I just wish we could have sent people home with the feeling they were supposed to have."

Furthermore, when Pollard starts hitting three-pointers, you know it just isn't your day.

"Yeah, that was crazy. We really don't play him on the perimeter, and when he hit it, we knew that was just about it," forward Manny Dies said.

The seniors finished in style exiting the court only to receive an uproar of belligerent crowd noise. Two other seniors, Steve Ransom and Joel Branstrom, also scored two apiece in KU's victory.

Now, K-State just hopes that some team from Kansas will win the NCAA tournament.

"Since we're probably not going to be in the national championship, I think someone from Kansas should win it," guard Marcus McCollough said. "They're the best team, and they should win it. They're that good."

"The many ballads performed seemed to flow like a river. The music had a sweet, subtle sound. It was lullaby type of music."

MEMBERS OF THE BALTIMORE CONSORT exchange instruments between songs Sunday in All Faiths Chapel. The concert was originally scheduled for McCain Auditorium, but had to be moved because of problems in the auditorium.

The 16th- and 17th-century era of Elizabethan England music filled All Faiths Chapel on Sunday afternoon as part of the McCain Performance Series.

The Baltimore Consort, made up of six musicians, played a variety of ballads with instruments popular during Shakespeare's time. Five of the musicians played one or more instruments, and one member sang soprano.

Music Review

This was the group's first performance in Kansas.

The Baltimore Consort was formed in 1980 to perform English instrumental music of William Shakespeare's time but has branched out to cover British, French and Italian music of the 16th and 17th centuries in addition to its original arrangements.

Some of the instruments used are not made anymore and some of them relatively unknown. These instruments included viols, rebec, cittern, baroque guitar, lute, recorder, flute, bagpipe and pennywhistle.

The baroque guitar, lute, bagpipe and flute were the instruments that seemed to really stand out throughout the performance.

The baroque guitar was made up of nine strings. This instrument kept a nice rhythmic beat throughout the performance.

The lute was a 19-string guitar-type instrument. It was made of strips of wood.

The bagpipes added flavor to the performance. In many of the ballads, the bagpipes gave a sense of being in Scotland.

The first half of the concert consisted of ballads from the early to mid-16th century. The second half featured music from the late 16th century and early 17th centuries. These ballads had a toe-stepping, rock beat. In this half of the performance the musicians livened up the crowd by having a little fun with each other. This was done by giving some of the members a chance to show off playing their instruments.

The many ballads performed seemed to flow like a river. The music had a sweet, subtle sound. It was a lullaby type of music.

Custer LaRue performed the solos. In "The Northern Lasse's Lamentation," LaRue's vocal solo was sweet and mellow. The music in this song was just light enough that it didn't overpower her performance. It was almost as if she were singing a capella.

The ballad "My Thing is My Own" was about a woman who had many suitors who desired her. The suitors made many advances toward her, but she wanted to remain pure until marriage. In this ballad LaRue told the story well, and the lute, baroque guitar and flute kept the story flowing.

Some of the ballads were hard to understand unless you knew what they were about beforehand.

The concert was a moving experience. The harmony was smooth and soft. The music was so soft at times that a baby could have gone to sleep by the soft, subtle sound.

▶ AURASCOPE BY C. ERA SAILER

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) You may have an unavoidable collision with authority this week. Do not abandon yourself for a kinder, gentler way out. You might have to put up a fight, but it will be worth it. You will have a lot of opportunities to make a difference. Don't pass it up for the path of least resistance.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Feeling drained? It is only going to get worse. Remember the healing power of a long walk alone, and use every source of support you have. You will have to address old wounds head-on in the upcoming weeks, so get your spirit centered to prepare.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) It's time to start sifting priorities to develop a short-term blueprint for your life. It will come in handy when you lack the incentive to dodge temptation. If you can't decide what you want, your indecision will rationalize a neglect of discipline and your destination will be a brutal self-sabotage.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) It is the dawning of the confrontation of skeletons. While you've been suppressing unwanted emotion, you've been dulling the blade of positive emotion as well. A heightened sensitivity this week is an indicator it's the season for an introspective dive, but others will notice your absence, so leave a note and bring a flashlight.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Your temper might have outstayed its welcome, and you're running out of people to blame for your whining. Those normally tolerant of your intensity might be overloaded, and you might be staging your own rejection. The charm isn't going to work. You're going to owe some amends and make some serious changes.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Quit while you're still behind. A grasp of money is beyond your grasp this week, and you need to restructure your budget. You might be intimidating as a lover, so lighten your voice and be gentle.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Plug your intuition into stereo, and put all logic on the back burner. The force is with you. You can do no wrong this week. You're going to have to answer a lot of questions, but your ideas are in demand. Don't duck responsibility. Your eloquence will be unprecedented.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) For one with such a leash on words, you might have a hell of a time trying to communicate this week. It might have something to do with the thickening static in the connection in those infinite 18 inches between the heart and mind. You may have to allow practicality to tame the mystery in romance.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Beware of stability, because your natural inclination might be to screw it up, just for the familiarity of chaos. If you're missing the edge look no further than your love life. What love life? Your farsightedness might be blinding you to an obvious love.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) If your rigid extremes seem to be getting old, you're catching on. Hit the pause button on your opinions just long enough to absorb the surface of another's perspective. Your mantra this week is, "I don't have to be right, it's OK to be wrong." When in doubt, bite your tongue.

HOROSCOPES

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan.19) Everything is up in the air, but you might have more power to resolve things than you'd like to admit. Don't sacrifice romance for control. Your self-consciousness and your pride will only lead you to lonely and bitter weekends.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb.18) You're entering a dimension less than natural to your nature. It's called a supporting role. The passenger seat might seem foreign, but it is where you will be most effective for now. A personal vertigo of change is renovating almost every aspect of your life. Don't get off, just treat the motion sickness.

ASSAULT WITH A DEADLY PORK PRODUCT

A city councilman was convicted and fined $250 for smacking a store clerk in the head with a flying package of sliced ham.

Lynda Doss testified that Paul Riddick came to the store where she works to return ham that was spoiled. Doss said that when she put a package of fresh ham on the counter, Riddick shouted, "Don't throw that ham at me!"

The councilman then threw the package, hitting her in the head, knocking off her glasses and bruising her nose, she said.

Riddick testified that the woman had slung the ham onto the counter, snarled, "Take your damn ham" and called him an SOB.

Doss said after the verdict: "Nobody should be able to do that. I don't wish anyone bad luck, but he got what he deserved."

RODEO

sponsored a Kids' Rodeo at the mall for children 12 and under. The Queen's contest was also Feb. 15, and there were rodeo dances at Kickers Saloon & Grill Friday and Saturday nights.

A special rodeo was Thursday for children with special needs.

"This rodeo was designed for the success of these kids," Lynn said.

On Friday, an Alumni Banquet honoring K-State rodeo alumni was at the Ramada Inn.

Dick Jepsen, a 1950 graduate and past member of the K-State rodeo team, attended the banquet and the rodeo.

"The rodeo is quite a bit different than it was in the '40s and '50s. The facilities and organization of the rodeo, as well as the University and city cooperation has changed a lot. Also, the competition is a whole lot better between contestants and K-State and at the other participating schools," Jepson said.

Record crowds filled Weber Arena this weekend.

The Saturday night performance began with a bang as smoke and fireworks filled the arena.

One of the highlights of the evening was R.B. Warren's performance. Warren, a member of the 1947 rodeo team and past rodeo club president, made a special run in the calf roping.

At 72 and with only one arm, Warren roped and tied the calf. Later, he received a standing ovation from the crowd.

Tim Corfield, general manager of NIRA in Walla Walla, Wash., attended the rodeo.

"I was impressed that the rodeo has been around for this long and there is all this enthusiasm 50 years later. Rodeo is well accepted and supported by K-State. There is a lot of support with the community as well. It looks like rodeo at K-State is in really good shape and will only get better," Corfield said.

Entrants compete for Miss Rodeo K-State, make friends, become more involved in club

KARA LOWE
staff reporter

The crowd was silent. Seven anxious K-State women waited nervously as the rodeo announcer prepared to announce the 1997 Miss Rodeo K-State.

The crowd erupted into a series of cheers when Jessica Carnahan, junior in animal science, was awarded the crown Saturday night in Weber Arena.

Carnahan said she decided to enter the pageant because all her friends were doing it, and they talked her into participating.

All the participants said they made new friends during the contest.

"Running for Miss Rodeo K-State was a lot of fun. I became really close to the other participants. We all rooted for each other and that brought us closer. It helps to have friends participating with you and being supportive," Linda Nagel, sophomore in animal science, said.

Kindra Dunham, 1996 Miss Rodeo K-State and senior in family life and community services, said the contest was a good experience for the participants.

"I had never done anything like this before. It was a good experience that helped me get more involved in the rodeo club," Sarah Schwartz, freshman in animal science, said.

The seven women all had an interest in rodeo before the contest and many of them have been riding horses for years.

"I grew up working with horses, and I thought the contest would be something neat to try," Tina Heimerman, junior in animal science, said.

The contest is judged on appearance, horsemanship, modeling, an interview, a prepared speech, and a test about rodeo and K-State.

"I thought the interview was one of the best parts of the contest. The atmosphere was really relaxed," Lisa Dalton, contestant and freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, said.

Becki Collins, freshman in nutrition and exercise science, said that her friends helped her with the horsemanship portion of the contest.

"By riding some of my friends' horses, it helped me prepare not only to be judged riding a horse, but mentally as well," Collins said.

As the 1997 Miss Rodeo K-State, Carnahan said she plans to educate people about rodeo and represent K-State.

"I didn't think I'd win. I'm shaking and can hardly move," Carnahan said immediately after being awarded the crown.

photovoltaic cells per module, make up the solar paneling that extends in a curve across the back.

The batteries are housed on either side of the driver, who sits at the center under a canopy windshield. The batteries are typically housed behind the driver, Zahner said, but in the event of a crash, there's a risk that the batteries can break loose and hit the driver in the back.

Most of the electronic parts for the car, including the motor, batteries and solar cells, are kept in the basement of Durland Hall, where they undergo testing.

Darren McElfresh, senior in electronic engineering, is the electrical group leader. He and Hopkins report to Zahner with their ideas for his approval.

Matt Meerian, senior in electronic engineering, waved his hand around the room, where he lives.

"This is where the electrical stuff happens," he said.

Meerian designed and built 13 power trackers, which regulate the input from the solar cells to meet the voltage requirements of the batteries.

"We could have purchased the power trackers," Fowler said, "but Matt built these. Took him a year. We need them because the sunlight can vary. It might be above or below the 84 volts the batteries need to charge at any time."

Fowler compared Meerian's work to a graduate thesis.

All the parts of the car had to be tested and the results sent to the Sunrayce committee, Fowler said. The voltage characteristics of the panels and the batteries and a structural report on the design of the car were just two of the materials the committee needed, he said.

During the race, a lead car drives in front of the solar-powered car, and a chase car follows, he said. Three other vans carry the crew and supplies, and all cars communicate via two-way ham radio, he said.

A trailer large enough to carry the car was purchased last week for $6,500. The motor controller runs about $6,000. Zahner said the solar cells will run $10,000. Logistical support during the race, including food, lodging and fuel, will run $15,000, Fowler said.

The project has raised about $50,000 so far. Zahner thinks the entire race expenses will run $120,000.

Fowler said everything the team has to work on for the race mirrors work that would have to be done for the real world.

"It's a total engineering experience for students," he said.

Student Senate provides boost in budget to Recreational Services for 2 more years

BENJAMIN YODER
staff reporter

Student Senate increased the budget for Recreational Services on Thursday.

The bill increased the budget to nearly $351,000 for the next two years. The federal minimum-wage increase accounted for a significant portion of the increase.

Senate Privilege Fee Chair Jake Breeding said Recreational Services was looking for ways to increase funding without asking students for more money. Non-student and alumni user fees were suggested.

Senate also passed the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex Repair and Replacement Reserve Budget Continuance. The bill set the budget at $9,609 for the next two years.

Breeding said the bill will increase student fees 2 cents per credit hour.

In other business, Senate did not pass a resolution to require senators to visit two groups per semester.

At visitations, senators inform groups of the objectives of Senate for the semester.

Arts and Sciences Senator Sean Tomb said the resolution should already have been proposed to Senate. He said with elections coming up, the purpose of the resolution was negated.

"We really missed the boat here," Tomb said. "We can say 'vote for me,' not 'run for office.' This is really late for this."

Senate Allocations Chair Bret Glendening said he was opposed to mandatory visitations. He said it is a senator's job to visit constituent groups.

"I'm sorry we have to require these visitations," Glendening said.

Bill Muir, Senate faculty representative, said language of the resolution was vague. The resolution would have required senators to have two visitations in the spring semester.

"I really have a problem with the definition of spring semester," Muir said. "There are two different Senates in the spring."

Senate also allocated money to 10 University Activities Board groups for special projects.

The money will be used to pay for guest speakers, educational films and recognized special events.

MEMBERS OF THE K-STATE SUNRAYCE TEAM work on their vehicle last Wednesday afternoon. Working in Seaton Court, the team is preparing for the race in June.

K-State team seeks sun-drenched victory

A poster from the movie "Race the Sun" graces one wall of the tiny office adjacent to the machine shop in Seaton Court where the K-State Sunrayce team builds what will become its entry.

The parts of the solar-powered car the team plans to race this June represents hundreds of work hours, thousands of dollars and two years of time. And it still doesn't look much like a car.

"It took us a whole year just to see if there was enough interest in the school to take on a project this big," Ryan Zahner, senior in mechanical engineering, said.

Zahner is the project leader for the team, organizing efforts to design, procure parts and funds, and construct a car that runs only on the power of the sun.

Sunrayce is sponsored by General Motors and the U.S. Department of Energy, and attracts collegiate teams from across the globe to compete for the advancement of knowledge about renewable energy sources and energy-efficient designs.

This is the first year K-State will compete in Sunrayce, with nearly 30 people on its team. The race will begin in Indianapolis and end in Colorado Springs, Colo., 10 days and 1,230 miles later.

"We are doing this because Ryan wanted to do it," Eddie Fowler, faculty adviser for the project, said.

Fowler helped with West Point's Sunrayce entry in 1995. He said his involvement in K-State's project is hands-off.

"At West Point, the project was run by the faculty," he said. "Here, it's nearly all student-run. I have to approve some purchases, but mostly I just rubber-stamp anything Ryan says that we need."

Zahner said he first saw the Sunrayce during his high-school years, in 1993 when the race drove through his hometown of Kansas City.

"It just seemed like a neat opportunity," he said. "With the amount of learning we have to do, with the analyses we have to make, and the materials we have to work with, this is definitely master's level engineering."

The whole project involves both mechanical and electrical engineering, as well as marketing, business and graphic design, he said.

Chris Hopkins, senior in mechanical engineering, is the mechanical group leader. Zahner said he and Hopkins came up with the original rough design.

"Chris is more the artist. He drew the shapes for the car and did aerodynamics, and I did framework and suspension," Zahner said. "We try to find the most lightweight material for the design."

The design is still on paper, but descriptions range among team members from wasp to boat. Twenty-two modules, two to a series circuit and 36 strategic planning," he said. "We also have placed a number of Kenyans at K-State to do postgraduate work."

The majority of Hudgen's educational background is oriented to help the less-developed parts of the world.

"I want to establish a long-term relationship with Mexico and Central America," Hudgens said. "We live in a multi-ethnic society, and I want to prepare people to be global in the economy."

While at K-State, Hudgens said he wants to get students and faculty more involved.

"International and study tours, language and foreign exchange programs are a few ways I can get some interaction between K-State and other countries," Hudgens said.

Hudgens said one important goal of his will be making K-State a bigger player in the international arena.

"I want this University to be a world-class university and have a reputation that people think of immediately," he said. "I want to recruit the best international students and visiting groups throughout the educational community."

Hudgens earned his bachelor's degree from the University of California at Davis and his master's and doctorate degrees from the University of Florida. He began his duties as the new assistant dean at the beginning of the month.

CHINA

Albright also intends to remind the Chinese that the United States expects Hong Kong's capitalist way of life to continue after the prosperous British outpost returns to Chinese sovereignty July 1.

Albright hesitated before going through with the Beijing visit during a mourning period for Deng, who died Wednesday at 92.

Unlike they did in similar circumstances at Mao Tse-Tung's death in 1976, however, the Chinese agreed to have her there provided she left Beijing before Tuesday's funeral and canceled a Monday night dinner and sightseeing forays into the capital.

As a result, her meetings with Foreign Minister Qian Qichen, Prime Minister Li Peng and President Jiang Zemin will be in quick order, totaling less than three hours.

"She will get into the business we have to with China," said Nicholas Burns, the State Department spokesman. "And that's to move ahead."

Deng was regarded by many American experts as a leader who favored a good relationship with the United States. He also ordered soldiers of China's People's Liberation Army to fire on pro-democracy demonstrators in Tiananmen Square in June 1989 in an attack that killed hundreds, possibly thousands.

High-level exchanges, suspended then by the Bush administration to try to force political reform, are being stepped up. Besides Albright's visit, Vice President Al Gore is getting ready to go to Beijing, and Presidents Clinton and Ziang are expected to exchange visits within the next two years.

"It would obviously be a great advantage for China as well as all of us if there were a smooth transition," Albright said last week in London. "We very much want to have a multifaceted relationship."

In Tokyo, her next-to-last stop on an 11-day worldwide trek, Albright hailed Japan as the key to Asia's security and tried to nudge the government to trim its trade surplus with the United States.

She made a special pitch for auto makers and producers of auto parts in a meeting with Foreign Minister Yukihiko Ikeda. She reinforced her point by meeting with the American Chamber of Commerce on opportunities and barriers to fair market access, Burns said.

It was a matter of urging Japan to implement agreements already reached, Burns said. "She did not come here to negotiate trade issues," he said. "She came to raise issues."

hasn't really been making decisions for several years. I think that the current leaders will mourn his death but continue with their own policy.

"His death will not have much affect on foreign or domestic policy."

Deng's market reforms led to a more moderate attitude about the Chinese culture.

"Deng was pretty progressive by comparison to a lot of his counterparts," David Surowski, professor of mathematics, said. "He was one of the younger members of the old guard. He was never considered a hard liner but was much more moderate."

Parsons said Xiaoping would be considered a good leader of China.

"China has 22 percent of the world population, and their people speak many different languages," Parsons said. "It is hard to hold together, but he did that. The 1989 Tiananmen Square incident was his one black mark. But, overall, he will be viewed by history as a good leader of China during difficult years."

Wilmut said he expects the efficiency to improve. Someday a dairy farmer, for example, might make a few clones of cows that are especially good at producing milk, resisting disease and reproducing, he said.

A farmer wouldn't want entire herds of identical animals, because populations need a diverse genetic makeup, he said. Without that diversity, a lethal disease that struck one cow might wipe out all the clones, too.

The advance will also provide a much more efficient way to insert genes into livestock, Wilmut and others said. Inserted genes can be used to make animals secrete valuable drugs in their milk, for example.

Scientists now insert genes into fertilized eggs in a laboratory, which is an inefficient way to produce animals that use the genes properly.

Caird Rexroad Jr., an animal gene expert for the federal Agricultural Research Service in Beltsville, Md., called the new work historic for showing that whole mammals could be regenerated from mature-body cells other than sperm or egg.

FBI searches for men with possible bomb materials

Suspect

▶ FEDERAL AUTHORITIES look for U-Haul in Texas possibly loaded with fuel containers.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HALTOM CITY, Texas — The FBI searched Monday for two men with a U-Haul truck that could be carrying bomb components like the ones used to blow up the Oklahoma City federal building.

But the bureau urged the men to call the FBI or local police at once because of the possibility the materials in the truck were meant only for innocent use.

"This is very soft, very speculative information," said a federal law enforcement official in Washington, requesting anonymity. "These guys may be farmers for all we know."

Federal authorities said a witness told police the men were loading diesel fuel into containers in the back of the truck with out-of-state license plates at a Texaco station Saturday. Local police, however, said at a news conference that the witness saw three men at the station in Haltom City, a suburb north of Fort Worth.

Someone else at the station observed the truck held three blue plastic containers that appeared to be filled with ammonium-nitrate fertilizer, the FBI said.

The materials spotted in the truck could produce an explosion big enough to destroy a large building, the FBI noted in an advisory.

The FBI released a sketch of one of the men, of average build and in his mid-50s. He was described as having slicked-back, salt-and-pepper hair, being about 5-feet-10 and clean shaven.

The other man, in his mid-30s, was described as clean shaven with short brown hair and standing about 5-feet-9.

A spool of wire, a small box of what appeared to be red road flares and some type of generator also were spotted in the medium-sized truck, the FBI said.

About 50 agents from the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms were assisting in the search, said Dallas ATF agent Lester Martz.

The bomb that killed 168 people at the Oklahoma City federal building in April 1995 was made of about 4,000 pounds of ammonium nitrate fertilizer and fuel oil with a detonator cord to ignite it, government officials have said.

The FBI alert notes that Friday marks the anniversary of the initial ATF raid on the Branch Davidian compound near Waco, in which six Branch Davidians and four ATF agents were killed.

Leader David Koresh and about 80 followers died in the April 19, 1993, fire that ended the standoff.

The FBI asked anyone with information to call a toll-free number: 1-888-324-9800.

Tax-based plan for college tuition fails to help many

Clinton

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Tax-based proposals by the Clinton administration and Congress to help families pay for college fail to reach poorer families, says an analysis released Tuesday by two educational research organizations.

Though praising the administration for devoting more money to higher education, the groups said tax credits and deductions need to be balanced with more direct aid. The analysis looked at current tax benefits and those being proposed, including the tax credits and deductions offered by President Clinton.

"Tax policies improve college affordability, but student aid policies improve both affordability and access to higher education," said Jamie Merisotis, president of the Institute for Higher Education Policy. "If we are to succeed, our policies must reflect both approaches."

The institute, based in Washington, and the Educational Resources Institute, based in Boston, did the analysis.

Using Census figures and other data, the groups said middle-class and wealthy families send more children to college and are more likely to use tax breaks.

The administration acknowledges that it has targeted the breaks for middle-income families. It has also proposed raising the grant amounts available to poorer students.

Task force develops honor code to curb campus cheating

▶ RESEARCH SHOWS 75 percent of students on campuses nationwide admit to cheating.

NICOLE KIRBY

It's mid-term day in a large lecture-hall class and the professor has handed out the tests. As the students pass the piles of exams back, darting eyes discover that although half the tests are pink and half are green, they are identical.

The professor slumps down in the seat at the front of the room with his nose buried in a newspaper, never to look up again until the end of class.

Faced with this temptation to cheat, many students would succumb. According to research by the Center for Academic Integrity, 75 percent of students on campuses nationwide admit to cheating.

K-State is no exception. This became apparent in fall 1994, when 87 students were caught cheating on Principles of Biology tests.

The students were getting the answers to the tests from others who had taken the tests early and memorized the answers. Greek house members and residence hall residents passed the answers along.

When the Division of Biology heard of the scheme, it changed the answers on the regularly scheduled tests. Scores of test takers just filled in the answers from the early test without reading the questions or the choices.

The result was a scandal that made national news.

So the administration decided to be proactive and to solve the problem, Provost James Coffman established the Provost's Task Force for Academic Honesty, directing its members to find policies that would raise K-State's level of academic integrity.

The task force investigated the policies of other large universities, and discovered that many had succeeded in reducing cheating by instituting honor systems that expected students to adhere to a code of honesty and sign statements on tests saying they had not cheated.

Task force members examined the honor system at the University of Virginia, whose students have abided by an honor code since 1842. There, professors are in the habit of walking out of rooms where students are taking tests and giving closed-book take-home exams.

Taking into account the fact that K-State has no similar tradition of an honor system, they looked at honor systems at

WILDCATS ETCHED IN GLASS

MIKE LAFEBRE, of Trademark Sandblasting, puts the finishing touches on the Powercat at Video Express Inc., in Westloop. The logo form was created using an aluminum mask taped onto the glass pane.

Powercat graces doors of local businesses

Powercat logos have been appearing all over town on glass doors and windows. This latest trend of sandblasting logos is due to the work of Mike LaFebere of Trademark Sandblasting.

"Sandblasting logos is unique because not too many people are doing this anywhere else," LaFebere said. "I'm trying to make these services available to local businesses, students and individuals interested in displaying their school support."

The most popular logo around Manhattan is the 16-inch Powercat logo, LaFebere said.

LaFebere began sandblasting trademark logos three months ago because he anticipated an interest in the community.

"Right now, there is a fair amount of interest in the community," LaFebere said. "But not too many people know that this service is available."

When Trademark Sandblasting first started, most of their business came from businesses around Aggieville, because the logos were exposed to a lot of people, LaFebere said.

Usually, the businesses interested in displaying a logo have traffic going in and out of the building all day that brings exposure to the logo.

"At first, sandblasting was just popular with bars and other businesses in Aggieville, but now it has expanded to all of Manhattan," LaFebere said.

To promote publicity for this sandblasting trend, LaFebere said he usually spends about 2-1/2 hours promoting each individual item to be sandblasted.

The process of sandblasting itself usually takes about one hour and 15 minutes. It involves the use of a vinyl or metal template consisting of the appropriate image. The image is then sandblasted onto the glass and it leaves a permanent, frosted and consistent texture on the glass. The appropriate logo is then permanently placed on the surface.

"The logos will be there 20 or 30 years," LaFebere said. "My work will be around for a long time."

Along with the Powercat logo, LaFebere sandblasts greek letters, custom and national logos.

For a 16- by 12-inch sandblasted logo, the cost is $40. A variety of sizes and shapes are also available. A logo that is 36 inches costs $95, and a logo that is 6 inches costs $20. Usually, the 6-inch logos are sandblasted onto the windows of cars, LaFebere said.

Telefund ends Thursday, gets closer to project goals

TRISHA LANGFORD

It isn't the Jerry Lewis telethon, but it does raise money — not for muscular dystrophy but for K-State students.

The 17th annual KSU Foundation's Telefund collects money for scholarships and educational material for each of the nine colleges.

The Telefund began Feb. 2 and will wrap up Thursday. The goal for this year's Telefund is to beat last year's total of $827,000.

"As of Sunday night, we have raised $764,178. We are doing better than last year," Debbie Hollis, public relations writer at the Foundation, said.

Many of the colleges involved in the Telefund are experiencing the same kind of success.

On its first night of calling the college of architecture, planning and design raised $31,822. It was an improvement from last year's $24,725 total.

Telefund is considered the largest all-volunteer telefund for higher education, Hollis said. The volunteers consist of faculty and students.

• METAL DETECTORS PLANNED AFTER EMPIRE STATE SHOOTING.

NEW YORK — The Empire State Building shut its 86th-floor observation deck today to add metal detectors a day after an English teacher from the Gaza Strip shot seven other visitors, one fatally, and then himself.

Police and FBI worked today to piece together what brought Ali Hassan Abu Kamal, a 69-year-old Palestinian, to the United States.

Abu Kamal died late Sunday, five hours after he opened fire at the crowded tourist attraction, wounding seven and setting off a panicky stampede, and then shot himself in the head.

• PRO-LIFE, PRO-CHOICE FORCES DEBATE WHEN LIFE BEGINS.

TOPEKA — Debate over when life begins was rekindled Monday before a legislative committee considering a resolution that would direct Attorney General Carla Stovall to take a lawsuit to the U.S. Supreme Court challenging the constitutionality of abortion.

Under a 19th-century law, the Legislature has given itself power to order that lawsuits be filed by the attorney general. That law has not been challenged, and some believe it would not pass constitutional muster.

Stovall supports abortion rights and has not said whether she would bring a lawsuit challenging its legality.

• UNION PACIFIC TRAFFIC INCREASE IN WICHITA POSES DILEMMA.

WASHINGTON — When the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific railroads merged last September, it quickly became clear that Wichita would absorb one of the biggest increases in freight-train traffic in the nation.

The new Union Pacific Railroad said it would route 12 trains a day through the largest city in Kansas, up from the current four. And some would be long, slow trains carrying coal from Wyoming to power plants in Texas.

Because the tracks slice through the heart of Wichita, with numerous road crossings, officials and residents say the increased train traffic will jeopardize public safety, harm the environment and create a headache for motorists.

• GROUP CLAIMS RESPONSIBILITY FOR CLINIC, CLUB BOMBINGS.

ATLANTA — The FBI received a letter Monday claiming responsibility for both the abortion clinic bombings in Atlanta last month and Friday's bombing at a gay and lesbian nightclub.

The letter, purportedly from a group called the Army of God, was mailed to the Reuters news agency Saturday and was turned over to the FBI on Monday.

FBI spokesman Jay Spadafore would not comment on the letter's authenticity. Robert Basler, Reuters' domestic news editor in Washington, described it as handwritten, 2-1/2 pages long and unsigned.

The letter threatened total war against the federal government, said abortion would not be tolerated and promised future attacks on homosexuals. It also sought to set up a system so claims of responsibility could be confirmed after future bombings, Reuters reported.

• CLINTON ASKS ETHICS COMMITTEE TO REVIEW CLONE IMPLICATIONS.

WASHINGTON — Reacting to news that scientists in Scotland have successfully cloned a mammal, President Clinton asked a bioethics advisory commission on Monday to review the implications for human beings.

"This represents an remarkable scientific discovery, but one that raises important questions," Clinton said in a letter to Dr. Harold Shapiro, the commission chairman.

"While this technological advance could offer potential benefits in such areas as medical research and agriculture, it also raises serious ethical questions, particularly with respect to the possible use of this technology to clone human embryos," Clinton said.

He asked the commission to report back within 90 days.

"The volunteers show up at 6 p.m. for orientation and begin calling alumni all over the nation at 6:30 until 10," Hollis said.

The Foundation wanted to try something different this year for its volunteers, she said, and came up with a program called the "I have G.A.S. program."

Hollis said the acronym stands for I Have Guts and Stamina. Short Stop gas station donated tokens for two free gallons of gas.

"If a caller gets an alumni to donate for the first time, they raise their hand and are given a token by the volunteer gas passer," Hollis said.

Other prizes that callers can win include T-shirts, mugs, gift certificates and Fisher Space Pens. The grand prize is a mountain bike. The winner of the bike will be announced during the first time-out of the second half at Saturday's men's basketball game.

"We are trying to make it more fun for the callers. It could get pretty boring just sitting there on the phone," Hollis said.

All of the prizes were donated by the Manhattan business community. More than $20,000 worth of prizes were made available to the Telefund.

"They have really helped us out. Without their help this would not be a success," Hollis said.

AROUND 80 VOLUNTEERS call alumni Thursday night raising money for K-State. Last year Telefund raised more than $827,000.

Morning after pill wins FDA approval, called safe

Look it up on the World Wide Web. Want to know more about RU486? You can find information on the Food and Drug Administration's Web page at (http://www.fda.gov)

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The government today declared high doses of ordinary birth control pills, taken soon after unprotected sex, is a good way to prevent pregnancy. This announcement marks the nation's first formal acknowledgement of emergency contraception.

European women who are raped, whose birth control failed or who just forget contraceptives have been prescribed a handful of regular contraception as morning-after pills for years. The pills are sold specially packaged to have on hand in case of an emergency.

But those same contraceptive manufacturers refuse to sell birth control pills for morning-after use in the United States, citing litigation and political fears. While it is legal for doctors to prescribe the pill for emergency use, few physicians know what doses to prescribe, and few women even know to seek the treatment.

The Food and Drug Administration, acting on the request of advocacy groups to unveil what they call the best-kept secret of women's health care, independently investigated the pill. Today the FDA published what it has determined are the proper morning-after doses of six brands now on the market.

The pills prevent pregnancy by blocking a fertilized egg from implanting into the uterus, where it would normally grow into an embryo. If a woman already is pregnant, the pills will have no effect.

The FDA said for the method to work, two to four birth control pills must be taken up to 72 hours after sex. The same dose is taken again exactly 12 hours later. The regimen is effective at preventing pregnancy 75 percent of the time, the FDA said.

The six brands that work are two tablets of Wyeth-Ayerst Laboratories' Ovral, or four tablets of any of the following: Wyeth's Nordette; or Lo/Ovral, Triphasil or Berlex Laboratories' Levlen or Tri-Levlen.

Nausea and vomiting, sometimes severe enough to prevent the emergency contraceptive from working, are the main side effects.

The FDA action legally is a request for contraceptive manufacturers to seek permission to advertise morning-after contraception — essentially a pre-approval pending the filing of the proper paperwork.

But the FDA decided not to force contraceptive makers to relabel their pills, something women's groups had requested. The decision, to be published Tuesday in the Federal Register, primarily will act as a prescription guide for physicians.

The agency also hopes that women's groups will use it to spread the word about emergency contraception.

Already, a small group of doctors and family-planning workers have started a campaign to publicize morning-after pills. The Reproductive Health Technologies Project has a hot line to inform women about the method and refer them to doctors in their area to prescribe the pills. Similar information is posted on the Internet.

candidate RESPONSE

Prospective City Commissioners answer important questions

INFORMATION COMPILED BY MATT SPURGIN

Each candidate for the City Commission was asked to respond to the following three questions.

1) What do you think are the important issues facing the City Commission?

2) How can you make a difference?

3) How will your position help K-State students?

Mary Nichols:

1) She said economic growth is very important and Manhattan has no employment for the minds that are coming out of K-State.

"We cannot continue to depend on the economic legs we are standing on."

2) Nichols said she has experience on the school board and the commission needs to work as a team with K-State and Fort Riley. She said she can see the big picture.

"I believe leadership is vital."

3) She said she would like to see the student body president at City Commission meetings, and she would like to bring more jobs to town. She said there is a problem for spouses of faculty members to find jobs in town.

"I am active with the student body and senate."

Roger Reitz:

1) "We are all going to say about the same thing."

That would be economic development. Reitz said Manhattan needs to broaden its economic base.

"We need to deal with aggressiveness to outside business."

2) He said he believes in a representative government rather than town meetings, and he feels he has the ability to make a judgment call. He would like feedback from citizens, but he reserves the right to make a judgment.

"I have a pretty good way of reading people's feelings."

3) Reitz said he is a K-State graduate and comes from a K-State family. He said he can see the needs of K-State students including parking, traffic, stoplights and housing.

"I would be willing to deal with the K-State authorities on any of the issues."

Ed Klimek:

1) "The issues probably deal on the direction the city will go in the next four years."

Klimek said economic development and how to continue the quality of life were all important. He would also like to make Manhattan a better place for the youth.

"I feel the foundation of the community is in the youth."

He said he would like to make sure the young people have places to work and that there are jobs available.

2) "I'll try to spearhead those ideas and get the momentum going."

3) "K-State students can be as much a part of the community of Manhattan as they wish."

Klimek said he would like to create good high-tech jobs for students who want to stay in Manhattan after they graduate.

"All the issues face college students to the extent which they wish to be involved."

Ralph Wasem:

1) "First and foremost it is one of expense. We need to find ways to provide the same services and reduce the budget."

2) Wasem said he would use his experience in understanding budgets and try to get the other City Commission members and the city manager to understand that there are ways to reduce the budget.

3) "I don't know how to reach students directly."

He said the best way is to work with the University and encourage students to use services that the city provides such as the codes and inspection department.

Karen McCulloh:

1) "The budget and how we're going to pay for things people think we should have."

McCulloh said economic development was a big issue, and she would like the city to be more economically diverse and not so dependent on K-State and Fort Riley.

2) McCulloh believes her experience and ideas are something that can be built on in the commission.

3) She said students are usually not involved although students are concerned about things such as crime, parking and transportation.

"They live here, but in a transitory way."

She said she is supportive of student's needs.

Edith Stunkel:

1) She said there were really too many issues to mention, but there were two main categories — a higher accountability of taxpayer money and maintaining the commission as a highly effective policy-making team.

"All the other topics fit within these two."

2) She said she has worked to make the commission more effective and to increase citizen participation.

"We can't take citizen participation for granted."

3) "Since most of the students live off campus, I consider them citizens."

Stunkel said she would like to see more student participation in the local government.

Stanley Crowter:

1) He said bringing business into Manhattan and keeping the old business here are important issues.

2) "I'm not a yes man. I will tell you no in a heartbeat. I will listen to the taxpayers."

3) "I'd like to see K-State back on their own."

Crowter said annexing K-State was a bad idea and since the annexation, it has become a city college.

"It's Kansas State, not Manhattan State."

Breta Bloomberg-Ellis:

1) "My main thing is that the businesses that are getting the half-cent tax are accountable."

Bloomberg-Ellis said she is also concerned about the city's budget.

2) "I've been pretty active in city government for the past three years."

She said she is involved in many neighborhood groups, and she has attended most commission meetings in the past three years.

"I feel I have a pretty good grasp on the issues."

3) "Several on the University/city projects will benefit, not only the city, but the students."

She said by getting people to come and spend money in Manhattan, the city and K-State will benefit.

Now is the time to support the Little Apple's budding entertainment options

There's a rumor around town that there's nothing to do in Manhattan. This isn't true.

The Manhattan music scene has grown more diverse, developing the talents of local musicians and bands, through the efforts of local businesses and organizations.

Local bands play in area bars several times a week. Without support from students, this movement will die out. Students can show support for the local music movement by attending performances.

BirdHouse Music series has been a successful engine for a variety of kinds of music. This organization brings in artists from different backgrounds including jazz and folk music.

Jazz on Poyntz is another successful music series sponsored by the Manhattan Center for the Arts that brings music to students. Some artists are students themselves.

The Manhattan Town Center plays host to a local competition every Thursday for bands to compete for money. It also offers students a chance to listen to the music of their peers.

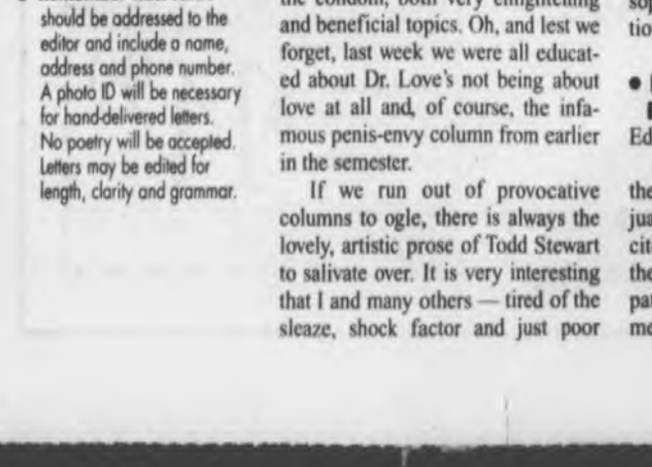
Theses performances are often free or have a minimal cost.

With student support, musical performances, such as Country Stampede, have become a success. With greater support, Manhattan will have the reputation to bring in bigger names and bigger bands.

One drawback is that Manhattan still needs more 18-and-over clubs for young adults. The increase of under-age clubs would help incoming students integrate into the college experience.

Manhattan has the potential to play host to a diverse musical scene if this movement is supported by students.

Check the Collegian for art briefs and stories about upcoming events. Also look for the Friday band series for details on local bands and where bands will be playing next.



Show some appreciation for the hard work and dedication of Manhattan's local bands and music-ori-

Women, children and moviegoers first!

Hollywood should try to plug the holes in disaster movie plots

If you took seriously the shows now playing on our TV sets and movie screens, you would think the Earth was to be obliterated by nuclear holocaust, asteroids, killer germs, tornadoes, oceanic floods, earthquakes, volcanoes, hordes of terrorists or perhaps all of these at once.

VIEWPOINT

JONATHAN WINKLER

JONATHAN WINKLER is a senior in mathematics, physics and English. You can e-mail your comments to Jonathan at (winkler@phys.ksu.edu).

Disaster films and TV shows thrive right now, owing to a millennial dread that has more to do with custom (the same thing happened in A.D. 1000) than with the present state of world affairs, and nothing at all to do with good sense.

If you must vicariously participate in the end of the world by watching any of these shows — and at the rate Hollywood and the TV networks are going, you will soon have no choice — you should demand better.

Most disaster films nowadays are poorly made. Movie producers seem to think flashy special effects eclipse the need to provide a substantial plot line and characters more fully realized than cardboard outlines.

They rarely realize the effects look unauthentic on closer examination and that ultimately a movie survives by virtue of its human drama rather than decades-old pretend sound and fury.

For example, who now remembers "The Poseidon Adventure"? This film, based on a book of the same title by Paul Gallico, tells the story of a Mediterranean cruise liner capsized by a tidal wave and the small group of less than 10 people who finally escape from it.

Gallico peoples his book with interesting characters: a tough New York cop who experiences culture shock aboard a luxury liner, a retired Jewish deli owner, a Presbyterian minister and former football great who develops a Messianic complex, an Illinois haberdasher with a guilty secret and a spineless auto executive who cheats on his wife and lets his assistant do all his thinking.

The interplay between these and other characters, driven by their egos and fears, takes center stage in Gallico's book. The luxury-liner catastrophe becomes nothing more than a feature of the background.

But, in the film, the cop becomes reasonable, the deli owner becomes a retired Gentile hardware store owner, the Presbyterian minister turns into an unfortunate hero (he gets killed before the end), the haberdasher forgets what he's guilty about, and the auto executive becomes a model of professional rigor and marital fidelity.

Except for minor details of profession and age, all differences between the male characters vanish.

They get pushed toward the center of what Hollywood takes to be the American population distribution, so that the falling apart of the Poseidon can take center stage.

This film appeared a quarter century ago. While Gallico's novels are still being adapted for television, can anyone even remember whether the Poseidon was still afloat at the end?

Gallico let the poor boat sink to the bottom at the conclusion of the book. Then, angry at the inept film adaptation, not the least of whose faults was leaving the boat on the surface, he wrote a sequel to the movie rather than the book. This novel, bastard child of a different medium, parodies the worst sins of the film.

We find out that the New York cop was really on the boat not because he wanted to see the Mediterranean, but because he had been sent to guard some gold.

Gallico hurls more stereotypes at us, including evil privateers with pretentious Oxford accents and the usual assortment of Hollywood thugs, ranging from fat guys who are mean and nothing else to half-grown gunmen who take inordinate pride in their vestigial mustaches.

Although Gallico plays all this nonsense as if it were straight, we still recognize the satire of Hollywood cliché and breathe a sigh of relief when the damned boat finally hits the bottom.

Then we groan again when he throws in yet another stereotype — an evil gun moll who converts midstream into a selfless maiden and sacrifices her life warning the hero about the latest peril.

I'd like to pitch a story idea of my own to a film producer, possibly one of the independents that still has a little artistic integrity left. How about a movie showing filmmakers shooting a disaster movie on location when the real catastrophe hits?

OK I want everyone to raise their hands if they have had a weird, crazed, insane, bothersome or deranged roommate since they arrived here at K-State. Hint — if you didn't raise your hand, you are a either a chronic hermit or you are lying.

Roommates are probably the best part of college life, even with all the pain they might cause. I know every one of my roommates has provided me with hours of entertainment. Maybe I've just been lucky to have lived with nutty people.

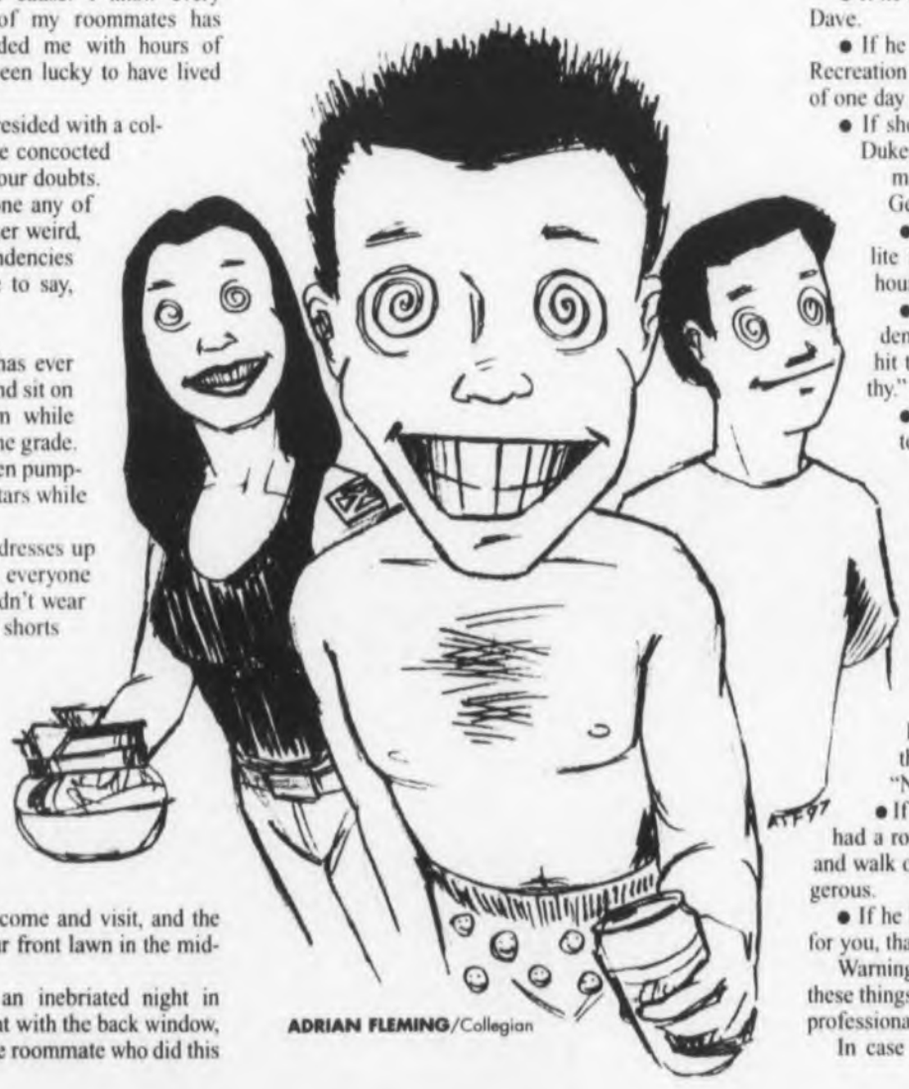
If you're not sure if you have resided with a colorful roommate, never fear. I have concocted a sure-fire test to answer any of your doubts. If one of your roommates has done any of the following things, they are either weird, crazed, insane, have alcoholic tendencies or, as the politically correct like to say, different.

● If one of your roommates has ever decided to use Nair on his chest and sit on the couch, stinking up the room while your girlfriend is over, he makes the grade.

● If he has carved his Halloween pumpkins in the likeness of dead rock stars while wearing a Bob Dole mask.

● On the same Halloween he dresses up as Bob Dole and offers to show everyone his tattoo. I'm just thankful he didn't wear a pink tank top with high-cut jean shorts professing to be Alexander the Great.

● If the police or some other law enforcement agency should come knocking at your door, and she invites them in for a good search-and- seizure after she offers them peppermint bagels.



● If he should have relatives come and visit, and the relatives wind up sleeping on your front lawn in the middle of January.

● If he comes home from an inebriated night in Aggieville and gets into a fist fight with the back window, he makes the list. I'm sure glad the roommate who did this came into my room at 3 a.m., told me that he was drunk and bleeding, and stumbled back out, leaving me in groggy bewilderment.

● If he insists on drinking Colt 45 40-ounces during every Monday Night Football game for an entire season.

● If he sleeps until 2 p.m. on the day of the first O. J. verdict and upon learning of the acquittal walks out onto the front porch in his boxers and screams the "Juice is loose, the Juice is loose!"

● If he gets mad and leaves petty notes about toilet paper usage.

ADRIAN FLEMING/Collegian

● If he collects change in empty pitchers of beer from homeless people in an attempt to fill it one more time.

● If he asks you to whisper "Betty Ford" into his ear when you think he has finally taken his drinking habit a bit too far.

● If she breaks down and begins to cry when the coffee pot is dropped and shattered. My roommate who did this had another coffee pot on the premises within two hours. She skipped class to get her caffeine. Addiction often ends with results, does it not?

● If he loses bills and then wonders why Discover Card calls him twice a day.

● If he demands to be called Edwardo and his name is Dave.

● If he spends four hours a day at Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex honing his round-ball skills in hopes of one day being able to play for K-State.

● If she has a tattoo of the General Lee from "The Dukes of Hazzard" on her left bicep. I had a roommate who would have sold her left foot to own the General Lee. I hope it wasn't a clutch.

● If she insists on having DMX, a digital satellite music service, tuned to the Salsa station all hours of the day.

● If he refuses to acknowledge that any of the 12 dents plastering his truck were his fault. "I never hit that old woman. That cast was just for sympathy."

● If he sold your clothes to his friends in order to support his spring break trip.

● If she relates everything that goes on in the house to MTV's "The Real World." I once had a roommate who almost set our house on fire over the Puck incident. Puck was her friend, what can I say?

● If he insists on teaching everyone in the house how to play chess. Then when no one will play with him, he sits and plays chess by himself for hours on end.

● If he watches the movie "The Blues Brothers" so much that 90 percent of everything he says is a direct quote from the movie. "No, ma'am, two fried chickens and a Coke."

● If he catches a nasty virus of kleptomania. I once had a roommate who could stuff a car down his pants and walk off the car lot unnoticed. The guy was just dangerous.

● If he keeps insisting that Night Train is really good for you, that Night Train is a mean wine.

Warning: If any of your roommates have done any of these things, you might have a problem in your midst. Seek professional help immediately.

• COLLEGIAN SHOULD OFFER MORE FOR STUDENTS' MONEY.

Editor,

Surprise, surprise. I picked up a Collegian today (Feb. 18), and what to my wandering eyes should appear but another column about sex in the opinion section. Is that all the students at K-State have opinions about or are concerned with?

Let's see, so far we have learned that Page Getz, champion of feminine rights, is a stripper, and the history of the condom, both very enlightening and beneficial topics. Oh, and lest we forget, last week we were all educated about Dr. Love's not being about love at all and, of course, the infamous penis-envy column from earlier in the semester.

If we run out of provocative columns to ogle, there is always the lovely, artistic prose of Todd Stewart to salivate over. It is very interesting that I and many others — tired of the sleaze, shock factor and just poor journalism in our student newspaper — are still forced to pay a subscription fee.

I can cancel my subscription to any other publication at anytime if I feel my money is not being well spent. However, every student at K-State subscribes to the Collegian when paying fees at enrollment.

I might not be as enlightened as the Collegian staff, but should they have the right to lighten my pocket without my consent or approval?

• DRUG USE LIMITS EXPERIENCES IN LIFE.

Editor,

Justin Wild's Feb. 20 column on the legalized medicinal use of marijuana misses the boat altogether. He cites that marijuana can help alleviate the pain experienced by terminally ill patients and that using marijuana for medical purposes will not increase drug-use rates. But this fails to address the bigger problem drug use represents, and that is a loss of ethos in American culture.

Rollo May said there is so much violence in American society today because there are no more great myths to help young men and women relate to the world or to understand the world beyond what is seen.

Persons rely on drugs to take the place of what primarily used to be a mystical voyage, the search for the experience of being alive.

It is through myths, religion or art, Joseph Campbell said, that we get clues to the spiritual potentialities of the human life.

Today, though, these vehicles have taken a backseat to more transient and less fulfilling means for attaining a sense of happiness or completeness.

Religion is seen as perfunctory ,and our culture's awareness of literature and other arts has dwindled to mere acknowledgement. The virtues of the past have become the vices of today.

The fact of the matter is, if we as a society give an OK nod to marijuana, we are just recognizing that we have yet to catch up with the moral necessities of life, here and now.

Campbell describes drug use as a "mechanically induced mystical experience" that does not prepare its user for life experiences. Drugs may offer temporary escape but cannot give us the permanent and lasting sense of ecstasy as can religion or the arts.

Drugs, along with nicotine and alcohol, are not, and can never, render the sincerity of the original human experience.

I believe Campbell said it best: "But then you also have moments of ecstasy ... . This is an essential experience of any mystical realization.

You die to your flesh and are born into your spirit. You identify yourself with the consciousness and life of which your body is but the vehicle. You die to the vehicle and become identified in your consciousness with that of which the vehicle is the carrier. That is God."

• READER VOICES CONCERN ABOUT GALLERY'S FUTURE.

Editor,

This letter is in response to the article that ran in the Feb. 19 Collegian concerning the Union art gallery.

I was sorely disappointed to see the decision made by the K-State Union Enhancement Committee. What was more unbelievable were some of the comments that were made concerning the future of the gallery.

It seems as if the committee is more concerned with how much revenue the K-State Student Union can produce rather than the real problem at hand.

Just where do you think all of the faculty, students and visiting exhibitions are supposed to display their work? If you think the space available in Willard Hall is the answer, you are very wrong.

During the majority of the spring and fall semesters, prospective graduates display their work there for a requirement known as the BFA Exhibition.

Another thing to consider is, what exactly is the Union for? Do you think that some business or retail store could ever come close to the aesthetics the art gallery provides?

The Union is not supposed to be a shopping mall.

It is a place where a student can relax, get a bite to eat, study, get school supplies, catch a movie, get together with friends or simply enjoy the surroundings.

I hope the committee seriously approaches this matter from all aspects, not just the financial one.

ARTIST Burt Brouwer shows slides of his art work Monday night in the Union Little Theatre.

Couple's work illustrates differences

▶ Need more info?
A show of paintings and prints by artists Bert Brouwer and Jane Marshall will be in the Union Art Gallery until March 7. Gallery hours are 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday-Friday.

Heavily symbolic imagery and a gross use of color bring a new Union art gallery show to life.

Paintings and prints by Wisconsin artists Bert Brouwer and Jane Marshall, husband and wife, will be in the art gallery until March 7.

Brouwer presented a visiting artist lecture in the Union Little Theatre Monday night to a small audience of about 30 students and faculty. Marshall discussed her work in the gallery following Brouwer's presentation.

The idea of a husband and wife artist team is not new, but always interesting. The Columbian Gallery in Wamego has turned this unusual situation into a show, "Shared Visions," which features a large group of husband and wife teams.

In the K-State Student Union show, the striking similarities between the two artists' work mainly serves to illustrate their differences.

Art Review

Brouwer's colorful recent work highlights his concern for social and political issues. His lecture began by tracing his career from early work to his later work, all of which makes sense in continuity. Color and distinct perspective pervade in his work from the 1970s to the present.

An early fascination with wacky Midwestern tourist draws is another constant influence.

"I wanted to continue commemorating these unimportant people and events," Brouwer said, speaking with great clarity of his work. He and Marshall flowed with ideas over the course of the evening, making for one of the most casually interesting talks of the season.

Witness the joksy, touristy "Duck Hunting in the Dells" acrylic, with its skewed perspective of hunters firing on tourist sightseeing boats, or ducks, amid the scenic beauty of Wisconsin.

What is most overwhelming of Brouwer's art is his chosen subjects. In this exhibition, the subjects run the gamut from environmental destruction to tacky tourism to Roe v. Wade. Is there a subject this artist won't attempt?

"I take things from different sources and put them in my own context," Brouwer said.

Take the Roe v. Wade painting, "Law in the Process of Stripping Her Bare," acrylic, which is an obvious focus on a political issue in a somewhat humorous way — a supreme court bird cage with nine bird judges.

Brouwer said he finds inspiration in the contemporary art world, the world itself, art history and folk art, the latter being the most obvious influence in the exhibition's work.

"Folk art is unabashedly a hop-skip-and-a-jump across all no-no's of the design process," Brouwer said, referring to the decorativeness and whimsy of folk art.

Another recurring theme in Brouwer's work is a sense of humor — some might say a post-modern irony of poking fun at grand institutions, classical orders and political correctness.

Marshall's work, although carrying a similar theme of nature, tends to evoke a more spiritual communion, as opposed to the tongue-in-cheek social commentary.

Spending from 1970 to 1975 at K-State, Marshall's visit to Manhattan was a more of warmly received reunion of sorts with former colleagues.

Marshall calls herself a narrative painter. She is primarily concerned with telling a story, although consistent imagery of chairs and blue herons keep popping up in her work.

Overshadowing the gallery, though, is Marshall's grand "Divine Comedy" oil painting, which consists of six painting units, depicting heaven, earth and hell.

The towering canvas, all free-flowing colors of gold leaf and fiery red, neatly divides the art gallery.

Of the piece, Marshall said paintings of the "Divine Comedy" she saw in her travels to Florence, Italy gave her some inspiration.

"Those painters had so much fun with hell, my challenge was to make heaven look fun," Marshall said.

Treen collecting speaker lectures about medieval dining

CHRISTINA SMITH
staff reporter

Treen. Treen what?

It comes from a tree, and during medieval times people ate every meal off of it.

John Riches, a guest artist from the Norwich School of Art and Design in England, gave a lecture Monday at the Manhattan Center for the Arts.

Riches spoke to a group of more than 20 people about the eating utensils of the 16th and 17th centuries.

A slide show that demonstrated different examples of treens accompanied his lecture.

In medieval times, every cup, saucer, bowl and platter was made from wood.

Forks, spoons and knives didn't come along until later.

The only place to experience the eating habits of this time period is a restaurant called Medieval Times in San Diego, Calif.

There, patrons of the restaurant eat with their hands and drink their soup out of bowls.

The formal definition for treen is any object formed from a single piece of wood, Riches said.

Riches began collecting treens shortly after he left the British Broadcasting Corp. in England in the late 1970s.

Riches said the fascination began when he bought a Victorian wassen bowl for his boss, who was retiring.

A Victorian wassen bowl is an elaborate wooden bowl.

It sometimes had painting or designs on it. The upper class owned most of them, Riches said.

That bowl never made it to his boss.

He loved it so much he kept it for himself, Riches said.

"Once you get hooked, that is it for life," he said.

Riches built his collection up to 5,000 pieces, then reduced it to 1,000 pieces.

Collecting treens can also be a money maker.

Today, these pieces can sell for more than $50,000 if they have been kept in good condition.

The pieces that sell for the most are those that have had gold and silver added to the base and the rims, Riches said.

Weekend trip reveals great show of KU basketball

Last Saturday was a day full of basketball.

My destination: Lawrence for the men's basketball game, to see what I have heard is one of the best facilities in the nation — Allen Fieldhouse. From Lawrence, I would return quickly to make it back for the more anticipated game of the day, the women's K-State-KU game.

Noon: I arrive at the Manhattan Mercury. My traveling companions for the day would be sports writers Mark Janssen and Ryan O'Halloran. Due to the fact that my Ford Tempo would not start for about the 100th time, I was without transportation for the trip. (Note: If you are thinking about buying a Ford, or specifically a Ford Tempo, don't) 12:15 p.m.: We leave for Lawrence in Janssen's Chrysler.

Travel topic highlights included how boring Janssen and I think the NHL really is, my future professional plans, K-State athletics and O'Halloran's academic career so far.

These were among the better Janssenisms of the day:

- On O'Halloran graduating: "Will you graduate sometime before the end of the century?"
- On Lawrence's best barbecue establishment: "We should drive by Buffalo Bob's and just smell it!"
- On O'Halloran offering directions to Lawrence: "We don't want to end up in Oklahoma City, do we Shane?"

1:45 p.m.: We arrive in the town Naismith built, basketball world, Lawrence. The town was full of sandal-wearing fans who were already providing game-day traffic.

2:10 p.m.: We arrive at the media parking lot. We would end up making quite a walk to Allen Fieldhouse. On the way to the facility, we are bombarded by fans begging for tickets. Out of curiosity, I found out a guy was asking $250 for a ticket. O'Halloran offers to sell him his media pass for $500.

2:16 p.m.: Made my way into the media room to find a spread of sandwiches, chips and dip, cookies and pop. No Iowa State horror stories here — plenty of food and drinks to go around. Luckily, I made it in line before Kansas City Star columnist Jason Whitlock.

2:45 p.m.: Kansas Sports Information informs me we actually only have one spot on press row. The other seat is in section 13 B, row 1. We made an executive decision that allowed Collegian Sports Editor Jeremy Kelley to sit there the first half, then we would switch for the second. Needless to say, Kelley received a nose-bleed for the first half.

3 p.m.: The seniors are honored with hundreds of flowers being thrown on the court. It is nice to see the seniors be honored, but the flowers were a little too much. This is a basketball game, not the end of an ice-skating routine.

4 p.m.: Halftime. While in the media room, I come up with one of my more brilliant ideas. Knowing it would be my turn to sit in the nose-bleed section, I decide to grab a photo pass.

Going back onto the court, I take my place on the photographers' area. There I am sitting, trying to sit Indian-style, with no camera and no equipment. My hope was that a player would run into me and kick me in the family jewels. If it worked with a fingernail painting freak in Chicago, why wouldn't it work with one in Lawrence?

5:35 p.m.: Depart Lawrence, heading back to the Little Apple for the women's game.

The road trip back provided a little less humor. There are only so many times we can make wisecracks about O'Halloran's academic career ... or lack thereof.

6:55 p.m.: We arrive back at the Mercury. In desperate need of a vehicle to go to the women's game, O'Halloran offers his ride, a 1994 Explorer. Oh, baby, what a sweet ride!

7:04 p.m.: Arrive at Bramlage Coliseum. It takes me forever to find a parking spot. Trouble finding a spot at the women's game? A new concept. I love it.

7:06 p.m.: I end up missing the first Jayhawk score, by Tameka Dixon. That's all right — I would end up seeing 25 other scores by one of the greatest athletes to play at Bramlage this year, male or female.

After the end of the women's game, I regretfully returned the car to O'Halloran. I asked him for a straight-up trade, the Tempo for the Explorer, but he declined.

What is the moral of this story?

If you have the chance, go see a game at Allen Fieldhouse. It is truly an amazing site. And of course maybe more importantly, don't buy a Ford Tempo.

Cats fare well at Big 12 Indoor, prepare for NCAA Tournament

JEREMY KELLEY

For one day it all came together for the K-State track and field team at the Big 12 Indoor Championships last weekend in Lincoln, Neb.

On the first day of the Championships, K-State qualified every athlete it had hoped it would for the finals on Saturday. But when Saturday rolled around, the once-streaking Cats fizzled out and lost a bit of luck, Coach Cliff Rovelto said.

"On Friday we qualified everyone we hoped to qualify, but we just didn't come through on Saturday," Rovelto said.

As expected, Vanitta Kinard won the triple jump with a leap of 43'8", which automatically qualified for the NCAA Tournament March 7-9.

Furthermore, weight-thrower Renetta Seiler threw a personal best. Only twice before the meet had Seiler thrown more than 61'11.5", but on Saturday, every throw of Seiler's was over that mark and her personal best of 64'5" gave her the win and made her fifth in the nation.

"Renetta had a series of throws that were just incredible," Rovelto said. "That was the best she has thrown this year."

Prior to the meet, Seiler had trained specifically so that she would peak at the biggest meet for K-State this year.

"I guess the training paid off, and I guess my coach knew what he was doing," she said. "It was a whole different feeling, and I guess it was just my day."

Despite the tough competition, Karissa Stewart, Belinda Hope and Emily Diederich received provisional qualifying marks in running events.

"It was some very steep competition up there," Stewart said. "Basically it was a mini-nationals and some of the fastest runners in country were at that meet."

Rovelto said Stewart ran very fast and she would probably have great success against the nation's best in a few weeks.

"She is certainly ready to compete in the national meet," he said. "It just shows how ridiculously competitive the competition was that she could finish in seventh yet get provisional marks."

RENETTA SEILER placed first and got a personal record in the weight throw Saturday at the Big 12 Indoor Championship in Lincoln, Neb. Seiler is an automatic qualifier for the NCAA Tournament.

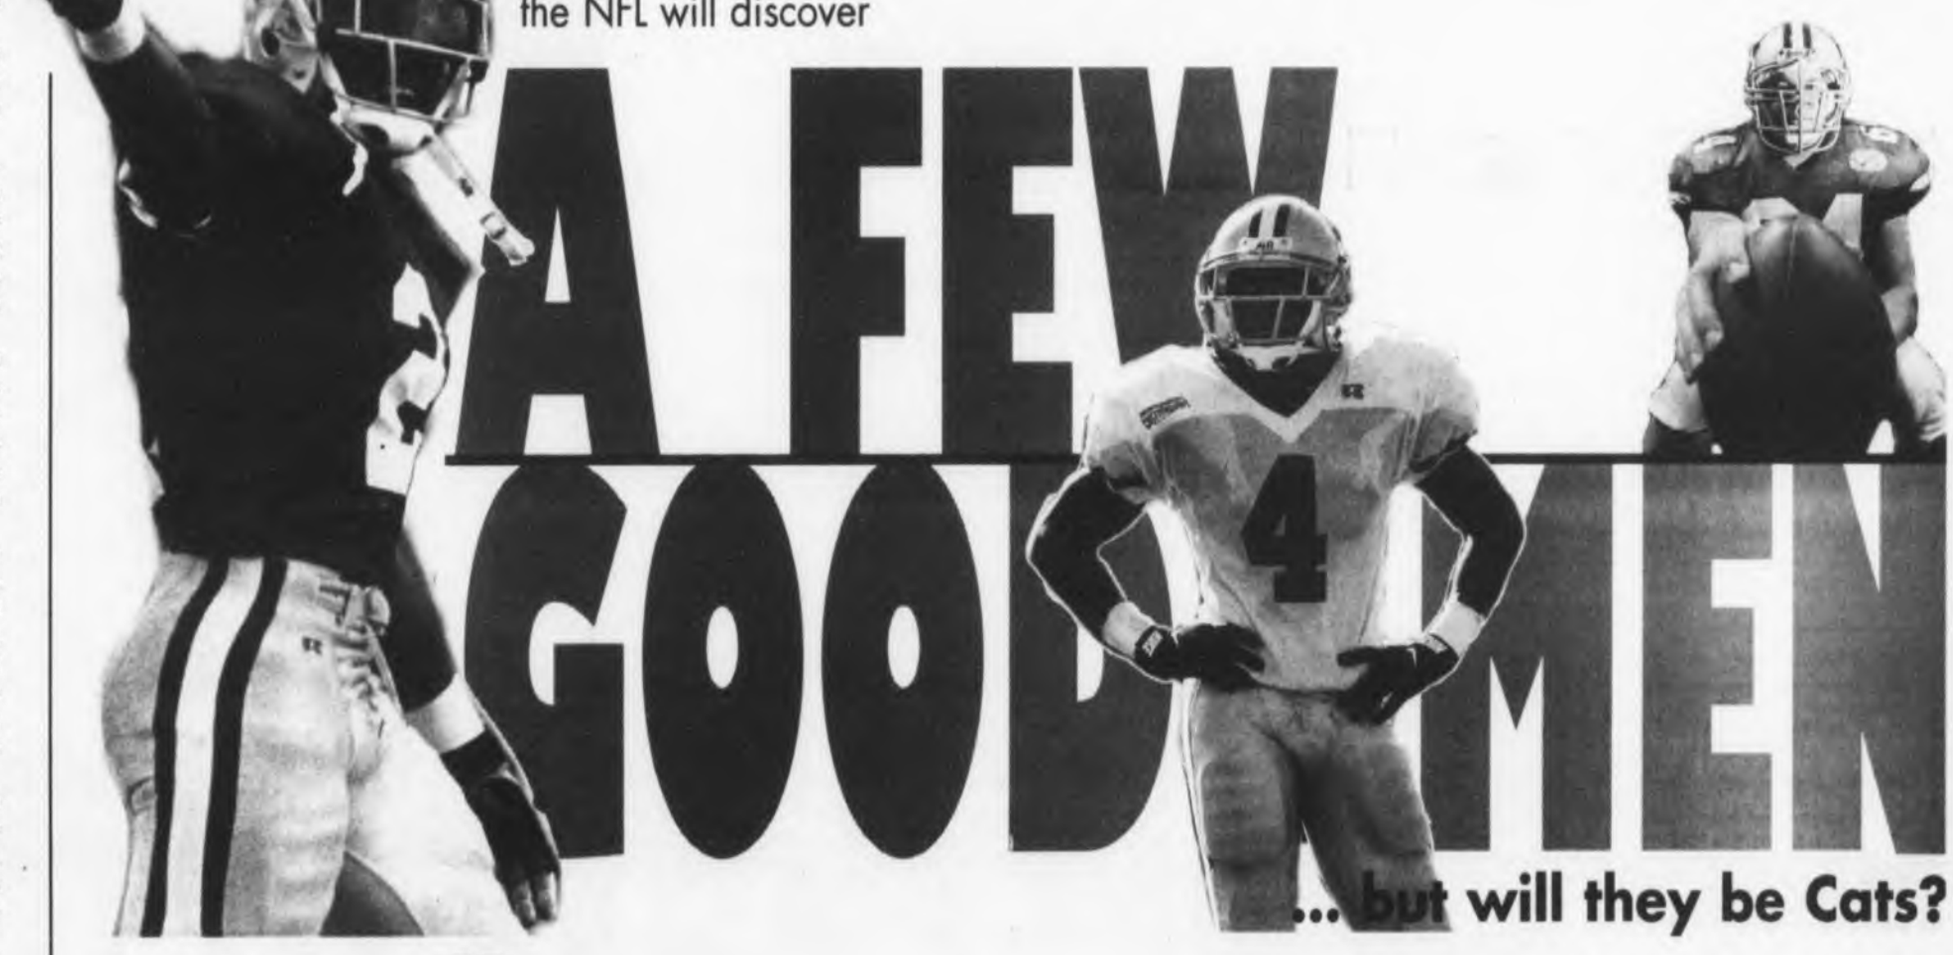
Altogether the women placed fourth in the competition, it was a finish Rovelto was satisfied with.



"We did as well as we could. I knew it was going to be very difficult to get into the top three," Rovelto said. "I don't think we could have placed any higher, because we were just maxed out."

On the men's side, the Cats boasted four provisional qualifiers in Matt Thompson and Gene Petersen, both in the weight-throw competition, Keith Black in the 400-meter dash and Ed Broxterman in the high jump.

Rovelto said the men caught the raw end of bad luck when sprinter Travis Livingston had his block slip on him in the 55-meter hurdles. Rovelto was disappointed because officials

Kevin Lockett, Jason Johnson, Mario Smith and Chris Canty have spent countless hours practicing and preparing themselves for Division-I college football. Now they are preparing themselves for the next level — the NFL.

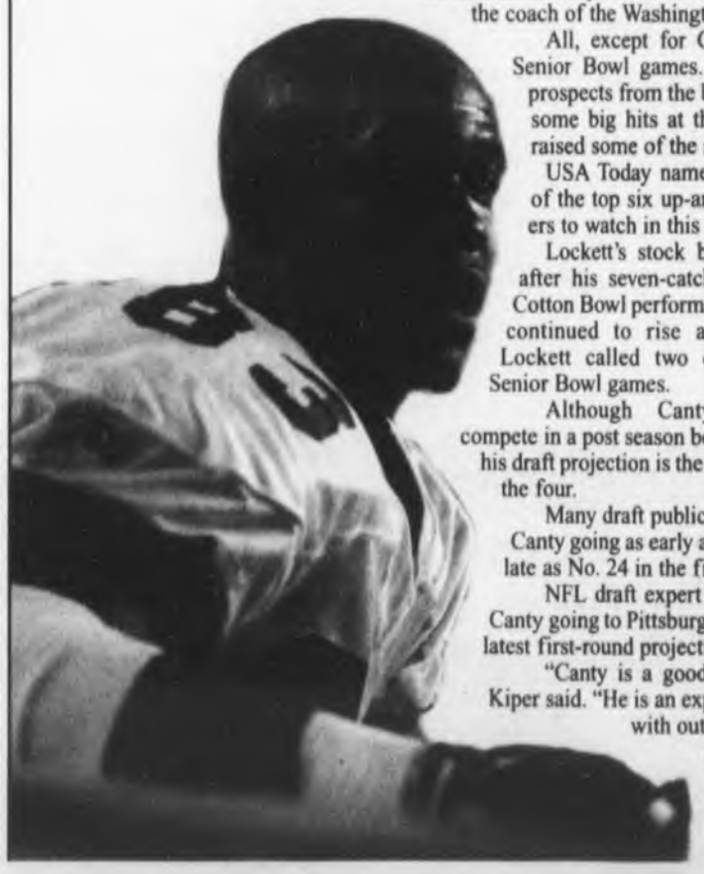
At the Senior Bowl, Lockett got a chance to see how things are different in the NFL when he threw for a long completion.

"For five years at K-State, I have been trying to convince Coach Snyder to let me throw that pass," Lockett said. "It only took me four days to convince the coach of the Washington Redskins."

All, except for Canty, participated in at least one of the Senior Bowl games. All seemed to raise their draft prospects from the bowl games. Smith recorded some big hits at the East-West game that raised some of the scouts' eyebrows.

USA Today named Johnson as one of the top six up-and-coming players to watch in this year's draft.

Lockett's stock began to rise after his seven-catch, 135-yard Cotton Bowl performance. It has continued to rise after what Lockett called two consistent Senior Bowl games.



Although Canty didn't compete in a post season bowl game, his draft projection is the highest of the four.

Many draft publications have Canty going as early as No. 8 to as late as No. 24 in the first round.

NFL draft expert Mel Kiper has Canty going to Pittsburgh at No. 24 in his latest first-round projections.

"Canty is a good value at this point," Kiper said. "He is an experienced coverage player with outstanding recovery speed along with natural instincts to play the ball."

Both Canty and Lockett were scheduled to participate in this year's NFL combine workouts.

"It isn't important where you get drafter, it's what you do after you get drafted. There have been a lot of first round selections that have been busts. Then there have been guys selected in the later rounds that have been all-Pros."
KEVIN LOCKETT

But Canty pulled out of the physical workouts due to the flu the day before.

After Canty, the next K-Stater expected to go in the draft is Lockett, who participated in all of the combine workouts.

At the combines, Lockett did numerous strength tests, X-rays, interviews with coaches and the standard drills — the 40-yard dash, the standing long jump and vertical jump.

For NFL scouts, one of the biggest points of concern is the receiver's 40-yard dash time. Many times, a receiver's time can elevate or drop their draft projection.

Lockett made it a point to work on improving his speed before the combine workouts.

Two weeks prior to the workouts, Lockett went to St. Louis to work with Bob Kersey and Jackie Joyner-Kersey. There he worked continually on speed drills and all of the drills he would see at the combines.

Going into the combines, Lockett was averaging 4.42 seconds in the 40-yard dash. At the combines, Lockett recorded a 4.55 time in the 40.

Lockett said, however, that his time was deceiving.

"They were supposed to lay down this new fast track, but it ended up providing slow times for everybody," he said.

"There was only one wide receiver that had a time under 4.5. So, my time didn't sound that good, but actually it turned out to be a good time compared to everybody else," he said.

Early draft projections have Lockett going anywhere from the second round to the third round.

Earlier, Kiper said, "It would be grand larceny if someone took Lockett in the second round."

Lockett said he is not too concerned about where he goes in this year's draft.

"I'm really not putting a lot of bearing on where I go," Lockett said. "It isn't important where you get drafted, it's what you do after you get drafted. There have been a lot of first round selections that have been busts. Then there have been guys selected in the later rounds that have been all-Pros."

Short, curly, trendy or chic, hairstyles are a personal choice.

So where can students go for a haircut when they have to leave home for nine months?

Just open the phone book. Manhattan offers more than 50 salons and barber shops.

Many say they'll give you the cheapest haircut in Manhattan. Some also have the title of full-service salon.

"We offer the best prices in Manhattan, and we will meet or beat other prices," Deidra Edwards, manager of the Salon Club Beauty, said.

This is an option for students who are always seeking out a bargain.

Chareline Cain, senior in life sciences and owner of the Classic Touch, said she can sympathize with students. Cain said she offers some of the most competitive prices in Manhattan.

Most salons now run specials, discounts and coupons. Look for coupons in the Collegian, the Manhattan Mercury, the phone directory, the K-Rock coupon book and the K-State coupon book.

The Manhattan area also features an award-winning salon.

Hair Experts Design Team was recently awarded the title of one of the top 20 salons in the country and was featured in the magazine Salon Today.

The Fashion Shop and Beauty Salon offers an addition to hair cutting. It is not only a salon, but a retail dress shop as well, offering sizes 6-24.

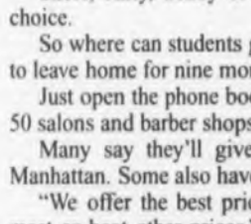
Full-service salons can now provide men and women with much more than just a haircut. Services include permanents, coloring, highlighting, waxing, manicures, pedicures, ethnic styling, hair extensions, tanning and massage.

Kristi Davis, junior in graphic design, said she really enjoys the extra head massage she gets with the shampoo.

"What a stress reliever to have someone else wash your hair," Davis said.

For some clients, their hair dresser is their therapist and friend, too.

Amie Keener, sophomore in interior architecture, said she can barely wait six weeks before her next hair appointment.



"Not only does he give great hair cuts, he's also a great conversationalist," Keener said. "He gives wonderful advice, and I would refer him to anyone."

Referrals are another way to find a hairdresser. People are walking advertisements for hair salons.

So, if you like someone's haircut, don't just smile, ask them who did their hair.

Scratch and sniff T-shirts change odor of fashion

VIEWPOINT

LINDSEY FORTMEYER

LINDSEY FORTMEYER is a freshman in speech. She will review the latest in fashion trends in her weekly column. She can be reached by email at (lkf8410@ksu.edu).

Pew.

Suddenly, the fashion industry stinks, so to speak.

What is the ill success of this prevailing stench?

Scratch and sniff T-shirts.

Yes, darlings, you heard me right. Like a piece out of your old sticker collection, scented T-shirts are now making magazines reek.

Imagine everyone's closets jam-packed with scratch and sniff T-shirts: closets would no longer smell like cedar, but an unpleasant odor of spoiled mixed fruits.

The aromas of these T-shirts vary anywhere from fruits and flowers to pine and peppermint. Mmm ... I always wanted to smell like a candy cane, as opposed to Malibu Musk.

No more spending the big bucks on perfumes and colognes. No way — instead I'll buy a T-shirt and give myself a scratch or two. Before entering a bar or party, briskly scratch your breasts and chests — the fumes are bound to pick up a date. There are no promises to guarantee a quality date.

If all else fails, at least the scratching sensations will attract an imbecile. There is no telling what kind of people in the Aggieville crowd would be attracted to this new sensation.

I envision men approaching women to get a whiff of their bosoms, millions of noses sniffing the chests of innocent men and women.

Scratching one another would become the new craze eventually used as the basis for a good pick-up line. Bathroom walls would now read: "Billy scratched Susie" or "For a good scratch, call Cynthia."

Because the nose is connected to your brain that, in simple terms, controls your emotions, a good sniff could influence how you feel or behave. The right smell could send a potential suitor into a frenzy. Of course, the wrong one could send him running. Manure fragrance, anyone?

When describing an enemy, you might choose to say they were scratched and sniffed one too many times or that they will smell anyone.

Furthermore, I could see the foul company that produces these shirts coming out with a grotesque new line of aromas ranging from soiled baby diapers to burning hog fat — oooh, classy.

The only drawback to the fashion industry's new scratch and sniff convention is the scent only lasts up to 30 washes. You either have to purchase another T-shirt or return to cologne.

And cologne or perfume isn't all bad. Before classes I spritz myself with light, airy scents that last throughout the whole day.

Instantly, my anxiety is reduced, my concentration improves and my energy boosts. All this from a perfume. Of course, those responses depend on whether a person wears something edgy, like Eternity, or if they settle for a grade above pure alcohol, like Old Spice.

Personally, I like to refrain from overused fragrances. I have one question for you CK One fans: are you a man or a woman? Just be.

The effects of scratch and sniff shirts could potentially be devastating, not only to the fragrance industry. Shirts could lead to pants to socks to underwear, and we can all imagine the kind of problems this could lead to.

I think we won't have to wait that long before the craze subsides. We all remember the influence of the hypercolor shirts, those shirts that changed color with body temperature or sweat. Those shirts have been reincarnated, more or less, with the current line of Dennis Rodman T-shirts where his hair changes from green to yellow with heat.

The popularity of hypercolor shirts lasted a few months (barring Rodman), as will the effect of the scratch and sniffies.

Maybe the company that produces these trendy clothes could take the shirts one step further. Taking a cue from the lickable wallpaper in "Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory," I could easily see purchasing a shirt that you could actually taste. Snozzberry anyone?

Perhaps I'm being too critical of this new trend, but I suppose one must acquire a scents of humor about the whole idea of scratch and sniff shirts.

Fads can be fun. For the first time in my generation, we will all really smell like teen spirit.

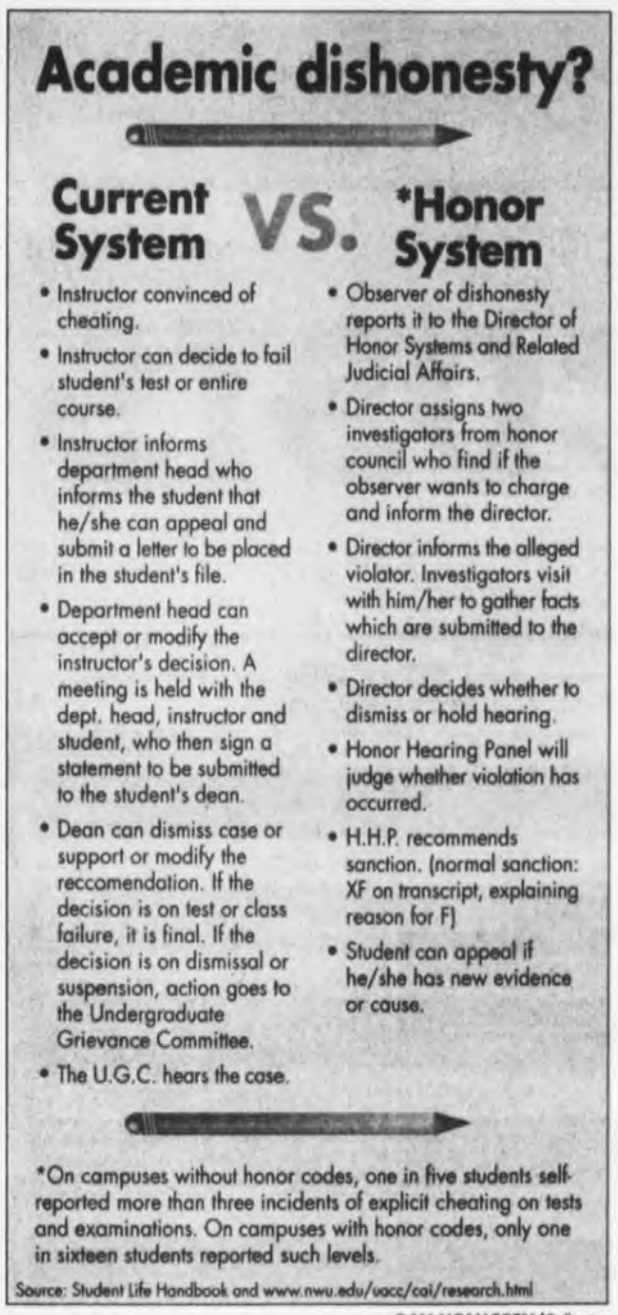
ONE VOICE, ONE VOTE

A state constitutional ammendment went unnoticed by local politicians in Loretto, Ky.



The incumbants lost their seats because they had no chance to campaign for re-elections.

Travis Greenwell, 23, was the only person to note the change in election policy.

He sent in an absentee ballot, the only ballot cast in the election.

Greenwell filled the four openings with his mother, his uncle, a friend and the owner of a local hardware store.

The hardware store owner was the only one elected who agreed to serve.

HONOR

Georgia Tech University and the University of Maryland, which are newer than the one at UVA.

Research from the Center for Academic Integrity showed them that schools with honor systems reported fewer instances of cheating.

After compiling and studying this information, the task force decided to draft its own version of an honor system. The draft honor system for K-State was prepared by task force members Mitchell Strauss, professor of clothing and textiles, and Brad Finkeldei, who was then a senior in chemical engineering.

> There's a chance that on occasion it's not cheating. It's just a misunderstanding of what cheating is.
> • Mitchell Strauss professor of clothing and textiles

The K-State honor code would be based on a code that states the following:

1. That as K-State students they will not give or receive aid in examinations; that they will not give or receive unpermitted aid in class work, in the preparation of reports or in any other work that is to be used by the instructor as the basis of grading.

2. That as K-State students they will do their share and take an active part in seeing to it that others as well as themselves uphold the spirit and letter of the honor system. This includes reporting an observed dishonesty.

It would also require students to write and sign an honor pledge on all assignments and tests, saying: "On my honor as a student I have neither given nor received unauthorized aid on this assignment."

In addition to asking students not to cheat, the honor system would ask instructors to teach and test in ways that reduce the temptation to cheat. This is in recognition of the theory that K-State is not ready for a system like UVA's, where the students are completely trusted not to cheat.

"What we're asking the faculty to do is that they don't act in a way that might increase honor code violations," Strauss said.

The task force determined that the new system would not fit with the current judicial process for academic dishonesty, and based on the examples of similar universities, included a new judicial process in the draft honor system.

The current system goes through a hierarchical chain, going through the instructor, the department head, the dean and the University Grievances Board. Each step in the process has certain responsibilities and restrictions. For example, only the University Grievances Board can decide to suspend or expel a student.

> There'll be some faculty in favor of a system that expects students to be more on their honor, and there'll be some who will be very skeptical.
> • David Balk Faculty Senate president

The honor system's judicial process starts with someone reporting an honor code violation to the Honor Council, goes through the Director of Honor Systems and Related Judicial Affairs and ends with the Honor Hearing Panel, which decides whether a violation has occurred and what sanction to impose if it has.

By creating a system that would allow charges to be easily contested or dropped, the task force acknowledged the need to guard against mistakes.

"There is a chance that on occasion it's not cheating. It's just a misunderstanding of what cheating is," Strauss said.

The standard sanction would be to fail the student from the course and place an XF on the transcript, with an explanation that this meant failure for academic dishonesty.

Because the transcript follows the student around even after graduation, there would be flexibility on this penalty, depending on the severity of the violation.

"We believe in redemption, and that although it may be written here (in the draft honor system) exactly, I think the basic idea is to follow the example of the University of Maryland that if a student has an XF, they can take a course on academic honesty to get the X removed," Strauss said.

The Honor Council would be composed of two students, graduate students and faculty members from each college, with three of each from the College of Arts and Sciences.

> If they're thinking 'Oh, I shouldn't do this,' and they have to sign something, it might stop them.
> • Anonymous student who was caught cheating in biology

Once this system was drafted, Strauss, who was now leading the task force, took it to the Academic Affairs Committee of the Student Senate. Then Committee Chair Jeff Dougan worked with Strauss to present it to Senate. The senators voted 42-8 to support the honor system, but not until they made a significant change in the proposed judicial system.

The original system said Honor Council members would be elected by the students and faculty, but senators changed the selection process to appointment. Dougan said appointment is the traditional way Midwestern judges are chosen, and so that's what the senators were more comfortable with.

"We thought it'd be a little easier to facilitate that way, too," Dougan said.

Now Strauss and Dougan have taken the honor system to the Faculty Senate for its approval. This week the Academic Affairs Committee is discussing the system, and when committee members decide they are ready, they will bring it to the entire Faculty Senate, which will deliberate.

"There'll be some faculty in favor of a system that expects students to be more on their honor, and there'll be some who will be very skeptical," Faculty Senate President David Balk said. "I think on the whole, we will be convinced to give it a try."

Balk said it was hard to say how long the process would take, but estimated that there would be a decision before the end of the semester.

The Faculty Senate's decision will apply to the undergraduates, so the honor system will only apply to graduate students if the Graduate Council approves it.

If the Faculty Senate approves the honor system, a task force will form to implement the system for undergraduates.

In addition to a long implementation process, Strauss said the honor system isn't expected to be an overnight success, but will gradually help reduce academic dishonesty at K-State.

> What we're asking the faculty to do is that they don't act in a way that might increase honor code violations.
> • Mitchell Strauss professor of clothing and textiles

One student who was caught cheating in the biology scandal thinks the system might just work.

She said signing a pledge could prevent students from cheating.

"If they're thinking 'Oh, I shouldn't do this,' and they have to sign something, it might stop them," she said.

So if the honor system makes it through the gamut of approval requirements and implementation obstacles, that mid-term test day might look more like this:

The teacher passes out the tests to the students, who as they pass the tests back, are so busy signing their honor pledges that they don't even notice that there are three versions of the tests and that the professor is watching them all intently.

Legislature considers 2 concealed-carry bills requiring training to own handguns

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, pointed her handgun at the large screen showing a stopped brown pickup with a man slowly getting out of the passenger side.

"Can I duck?" she asked instructor John Metzger, who was acting as her police partner. Then a man jumped out of the bed of the truck and ran. Then the shooting started.

Oleen

Oleen, chairwoman of the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee, clearly did not miss her calling when she became a legislator instead of a officer of the law.

She fired into the trees a lot, then toward an apartment building in the background. She never did hit any of the bad guys on the screen.

"The concern is where the stray rounds go when you miss," said Major R.L. Miller of the Kansas City, Kan., Police Department.

Monday was weapons training day for legislators who are considering two bills that would allow private citizens to obtain permits to carry concealed handguns.

Later in the day, a House Federal and State Affairs subcommittee amended one of the bills to guarantee that businesses would have the right to prevent people from carrying handguns into the premises, even if they have permits.

Both concealed-carry bills require individuals to undergo some training before being issued a permit.

Using a state-of-the-art computerized training simulator with a large screen and a laser gun, lawmakers tested their steely nerves in situations that both police and private citizens carrying guns might confront. The simulator was set up at the headquarters of the Topeka Police Department.

The computer recorded where every electronic bullet fired by the lawmakers landed during the simulated shootouts.

The simulator is a product of Firearms Training System Inc., based in Atlanta.

Metzger, a former Kansas City, Mo., cop who is sales representative for the firm, guided the legislators through various scenarios.

And he said emphatically that civilians who carry concealed weapons should undergo such training, because it is grounded in reality.

Sen. Laurie Bleeker, R-Great Bend, shot an unarmed intruder breaking through a back door. The computer decided her shot represented poor judgment, although others disagreed.

Bleeker failed to fire in another scenario when an intruder lunged into a bathroom with a knife. She did not see the attacker.

"With the ownership of a firearm comes a lot of responsibility," Metzger told the legislators. "With that responsibility comes a lot of issues."

"There's a certain criteria you have to meet before you can use lethal force," he said. "You can't shoot somebody over property crimes. You have to be in fear of your life or someone else's life."

The subcommittee agreed to clarify that businesses can prevent customers from carrying concealed firearms into their stores.

"You can post a sign just the same as you can one that says, 'No shirt, no shoes, no service,'" said Rep. Gary Hayzlett, R-Lakin, the principal sponsor of the bill.

The House subcommittee also amended its concealed-carry bill so that people convicted of felonies who have been expunged or have been through pre-trial diversion programs would not be issued permits. It also amended the bill so that people who have been convicted of misdemeanors against people, such as assault, could not get a permit.

"Some of the meanest guys I know have never been arrested for a felony," said Rep. Doug Mays, R-Topeka, the subcommittee chairman.

The bill already would prevent people convicted of felonies from carrying a concealed weapon.

The House concealed carry bill is House Bill 2159. The Senate version is SB 21.

K-State merchandise tops biggest financial quarter during winter months

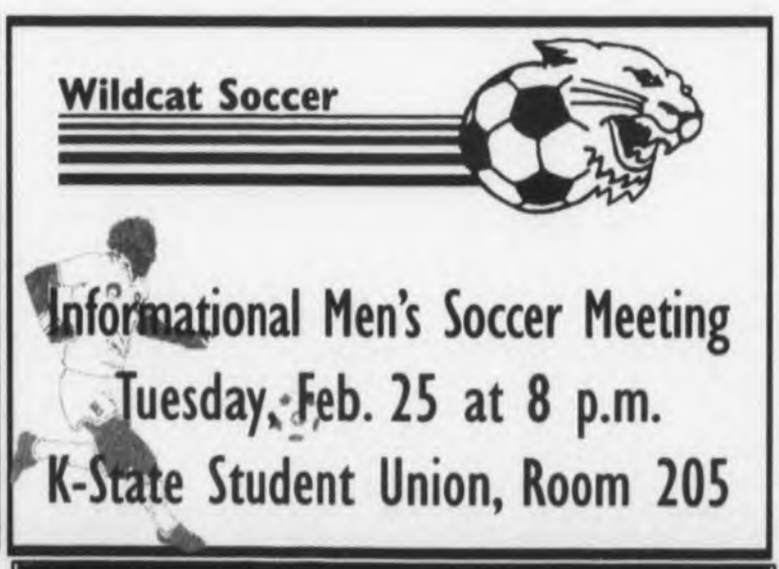
ASSOCIATED PRESS

MANHATTAN — In the last nine months of 1996, consumers snapped up more than $4 million worth of K-State-licensed merchandise. In the last three months alone — October, November and December, when football season reached its peak — sales of Powercat shirts, Willie the Wildcat hats and other goods topped $2 million.

It was the biggest financial quarter ever for K-State-licensed goods, said John Fairman, who, as assistant vice president for institutional advancement, is in charge of licensing matters.

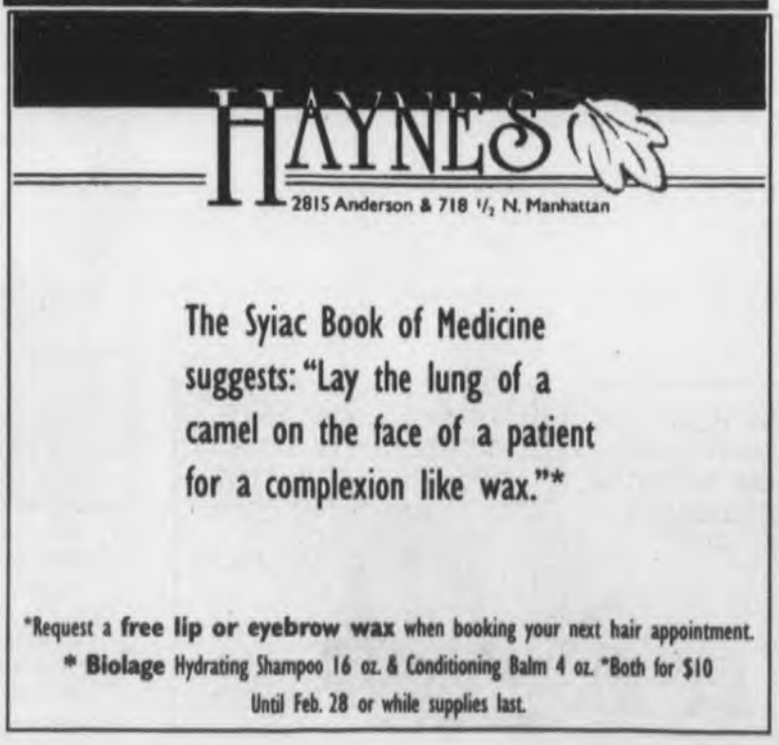
And it didn't even include all the sales from Christmas or the Cotton Bowl, much of which won't be recorded until the next quarter, Fairman said.

K-State first got into the licensing game in 1986, Fairman said. Total sales that year: about $93,000. Not surprisingly, the real growth spurt came when the football team got better, and the Powercat appeared.



"That might have something to do with it," Fairman said. "It just keeps growing."

The sales figures come indirectly from Collegiate Licensing Co., which handles the licensing arrangements between the University and most merchants. The company just gave K-State a check for $150,709 for the last three months of 1996, bringing the University's haul for the last nine months to $302,715, Fairman said.



Under an arrangement with the licensing company, the University gets 7.5 percent of the wholesale price of things bearing a K-State trademark, including the ubiquitous Powercat. If a T-shirt's wholesale price is $10, for example, the Students might not know what the McCain-Feingold legislation entails or that the Phillip Morris Co. Inc. donated only $350,250 in soft money to the Democratic Party while giving $1,632,283 to the Republican Party.

Web Review

This information, government reform news and campaign finance information are some of the hottest topics on the new interactive web site Common Cause. Common Cause provides easy access to various political information and is in a well-organized, easy-to-understand format.

Common Cause is entirely funded by membership dues and contributions. It also gives people a chance to express their political concerns.

The Money Trail, one special area on the site, gives Common Cause's campaign finance reports. The Soft Money Laundromat details the massive soft money contributions each party raised from wealthy donors and allows browsers to track soft-money giving by industry.

Know Your Congress is where people can find their congressmen's voting records, contributors to their campaign, and provides a way to contact them.

This site also lets the know-it-alls test their knowledge, and the know-it-all-nots gain political knowledge, with a five-question quiz that changes regularly. The Cast Your Vote & Quiz Section lets people register opinions daily and compare their responses to other visitors.

The Discussion Forums are interactive, allowing people to chat about campaign reform and political issues with others around the country.

For those who want to get involved in local fights to reform government, they can find out on In The States. It also contains Common Cause state organizations and its activities.

The Internet site is free. People interested in joining the Common Cause team can become a member.

High-school student challenges teacher in Hesston mayor race

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HESSTON — John Waltner's ability to inspire his students could cost him his job as mayor.

The three-term Democrat is being challenged in today's primary by his own student — 18-year-old Hesston High School senior Christopher Friesen. Friesen said he decided to run while taking Waltner's government class this semester.

"He has always encouraged us to stand up for what we believe," Friesen, a registered Republican, said.

Voters in today's primary can vote for Waltner, Friesen or another candidate, Chip DuFriend. The top two finishers will move on to the general election on April 1.

Waltner, mayor of this central Kansas town of 3,000 since Friesen was in first grade, had never been challenged as an incumbent until this year.

"I really haven't campaigned as hard as I could have," Waltner said. "I might well pay a price for that."

But he's glad that Friesen's bid is getting young people interested in politics. Friesen and his campaign committee, mostly other high-school students, have been talking to young voters and encouraging 18-year-olds to register to vote.

Older voters are initially skeptical, Friesen said.

"The first thing they ask is, 'Are you doing this for real?,'" he said. "When I say yes, they are very supportive."

Among his campaign promises are welcoming new residents with lower incomes than Hesston's upper-middle-class standard and affirming the community's strong ordinances against selling alcohol.

The campaign won't affect Friesen's grade this semester, but Waltner did make his student promise one thing.

"If I win, I have to come in and talk to his government class for the next four years," said Friesen, who plans to attend Hesston College next year. He has not decided on a major.

Waltner wants to be spared the lesson.

"There isn't a bit of personal animosity between us," Waltner said. "But I want to beat him."

Air Force ROTC officer receives recognition based on various factors

JESSICA CULLISON
staff reporter

Staff Sgt. David L. Anders of K-State's Air Force ROTC was recognized as the Junior Enlisted Member of the Fourth Quarter for the calendar year in January. He was selected over other entries from the Northwest Region, which includes 33 campuses.

Anders

Anders received this award based on his leadership abilities, job performance, social, cultural and religious activities, self improvement and positive representation for the Air Force.

"It is an honor to represent the Northwest Region," Anders said, "and to know that I've been picked out of all the other entries."

Anders has been managing K-State's ROTC Air Force Detachment 270 administrative functions for three years. He joined the Air Force in April 1984 when he was 22.

"Being in the Air Force was something I always wanted to do," he said. "I wanted to serve my country."

Anders received four weeks of basic training at Lackland Air Force Base in San Antonio, Texas. He then went to Biloxi, Miss., for technical training for his career field of information management for six weeks afterward.

In July 1984, Anders was stationed at Mountain Home Air Force Base in Idaho for four years. He worked for the 392 Electronic Combat Range Squadron, which specialized in radar and tracking equipment. From there, Anders went to Kunsan, South Korea, in October 1988 and worked for the Audio-Visual Squadron for a one-year tour.

He moved to Tinker Air Force Base in Oklahoma in October 1989, working in the 965 Airborne Warning and Control Squadron.

"I also had the pleasure of being one of the first to support the drug task force in 1990," Anders said.

He was part of the task force deployed to Roosevelt Roads Naval Air Station in Puerto Rico for 2-1/2 weeks to set up the operation initiating stricter control on illegal passage and trafficking of drugs.

Anders left Tinker Air Force Base in October 1993 and came to K-State.

The award Anders received qualifies him for national competition for Junior Enlisted Member of the Year. The competition takes place this month at Maxwell Air Force Base in Montgomery, Ala. Senior officers will review the candidates from each of the regions selected for each respective quarter.

Capt. Steven Dorfman, Anders' superior, entered Anders' nomination form. Dorfman turned in a detailed account of Anders' activities during the award period, Oct. 1, 1996, through Dec. 31, 1996.

The nomination listed Anders' participation in a local Parent-Teacher Association; his meticulous and expert work ethic; contributions to new leaders to promote team effort and unity; and his initiative and innovations.

"Outside of my job, the local schools are my No. 1 involvement," Anders said.

Anders works closely with the cadets of K-State's ROTC Air Force Detachment and said that is the most satisfactory part of his duties.

"What I love most about my job is being able to work with the young people that are going to become officers in the Air Force," he said. "I have the opportunity to help groom them so they can become successful in their jobs. That is the most rewarding thing."

Anders grew up in Junction City when his father retired from the U.S. Army. He met his wife in junior high school and said he is glad to be able to live so close to his hometown.

didn't call the run back.

"That's unfortunate for Travis, but it just shows how things went for the men," he said. "They kept losing a point or two here and a point or two there, and the points just kept adding up against us."

In the high jump, Broxterman faced some of the better jumpers in the conference and also in the nation in Nebraska's Shane Lavy, who has the third-best mark in the nation in the event, and Texas' Ivan Wagner.

Broxterman finished third in the event, missing his attempt at 7'3", but Rovelto said he couldn't stress how difficult the competition was in the event.

"That's what people don't understand," he said. "Yeah, you have to be good, but it really doesn't matter because once you get out there it's whoever can perform on that day."

The men finished seventh in the meet.

"For the men, the quality of competition was extremely high, but all of them felt the heat and responded pretty well," Rovelto said. "You have to be pleased."

University gets 75 cents.

This means the total wholesale value of K-State shirts, caps, umbrellas and everything else amounted to nearly $4.04 million in the last nine months of 1996. Just in October, November and December, sales at the wholesale level reached more than $2 million.

Retailers often mark up their goods significantly — an example being $25 T-shirts at the Cotton Bowl. So, the actual value of retail sales is probably much higher than the $4-million figure.

The big numbers from the last quarter will almost certainly push K-State into record territory. The revenue to the University in nine months of 1996-97 is only $1,000 below the total for the previous 12 month period — which was itself a record year.

For the July-through-December period, K-State sales ranked 17th out of the 160 schools represented by Collegiate Licensing Co. Tops on that list is Michigan, which brings in about $5 million per year in revenue from licensing sales, Fairman said — meaning consumers buy about $67 million worth of Michigan stuff per year.

"They're in another league," Fairman said.

K-State's No. 17 rank puts it in about the third tier of schools, Fairman said.

The rankings don't include schools that use other licensing companies — including the University of Kansas — or go on their own, like Notre Dame, Fairman said.

KU and the University of Colorado rank just ahead of K-State on licensing sales, Fairman said. Notre Dame ranks about second or third in the nation, he said.

K-State sales are starting to pick up at the national level, he said. People like the Powercat, and they like the image of a school in the heartland, he said.

"It's a good, solid, stable, plains-type university," Fairman said. "That seems to be refreshing as opposed to, say, a University of Miami."

About half the money raised by the licensing deal goes to athletic scholarships, Fairman said. Another $90,000 or so goes to general student scholarships.

About $10,000 goes to general University marketing efforts; some is put away in a rainy-day fund; the rest goes to scholarships for groups like cheerleaders and the marching band, Fairman said.

"This is the fun part of the job," Fairman said.

Ex-Rec custodian jailed in shooting of K-State student

The Riley County Police arrested a Manhattan man Monday for the shooting of John Ediger, sophomore in fisheries and wildlife, who was shot in the right shoulder on Sunday.

Studd Leach, Manhattan resident, was arrested for aggravated battery and is being held on $10,000 bond. He was still in jail at press time.

"It doesn't appear there was any animosity between the suspect and the victim," Lt. Herb Crosby of Riley County Police Investigations said of the investigation into a motive for the incident.

Leach used to work for K-State at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex as a custodian.

"He completed his term about two to three months ago," Raydon Robel, director of recreational services, said. "He was a temporary employee."

Further action will be taken after the reports are finished and submitted.

Ediger was treated at Mercy Health Center on College Avenue for his injuries and released Sunday.

New pill usage may prevent pregnancy

▶ FDA APPROVES USE of birth control pill for next day.

SHAWN T. DENTON
staff reporter

Women can take high doses of certain brands of birth control pills to reduce the chances of pregnancy.

The morning-after pills were granted the FDA seal Monday. Six brands of birth control pills in the market were published by the FDA, telling the proper dosage.

When used properly, the pills prevent pregnancy 75 percent of the time.

The new information has produced mixed messages from K-State faculty. Cathie Barry, director of nursing for Lafene Health Center, said providing information is good.

"I want to encourage women to seek further information from their health care provider about the use," Barry said.

The FDA said the pills work by preventing a fertilized egg from implanting into the uterus.

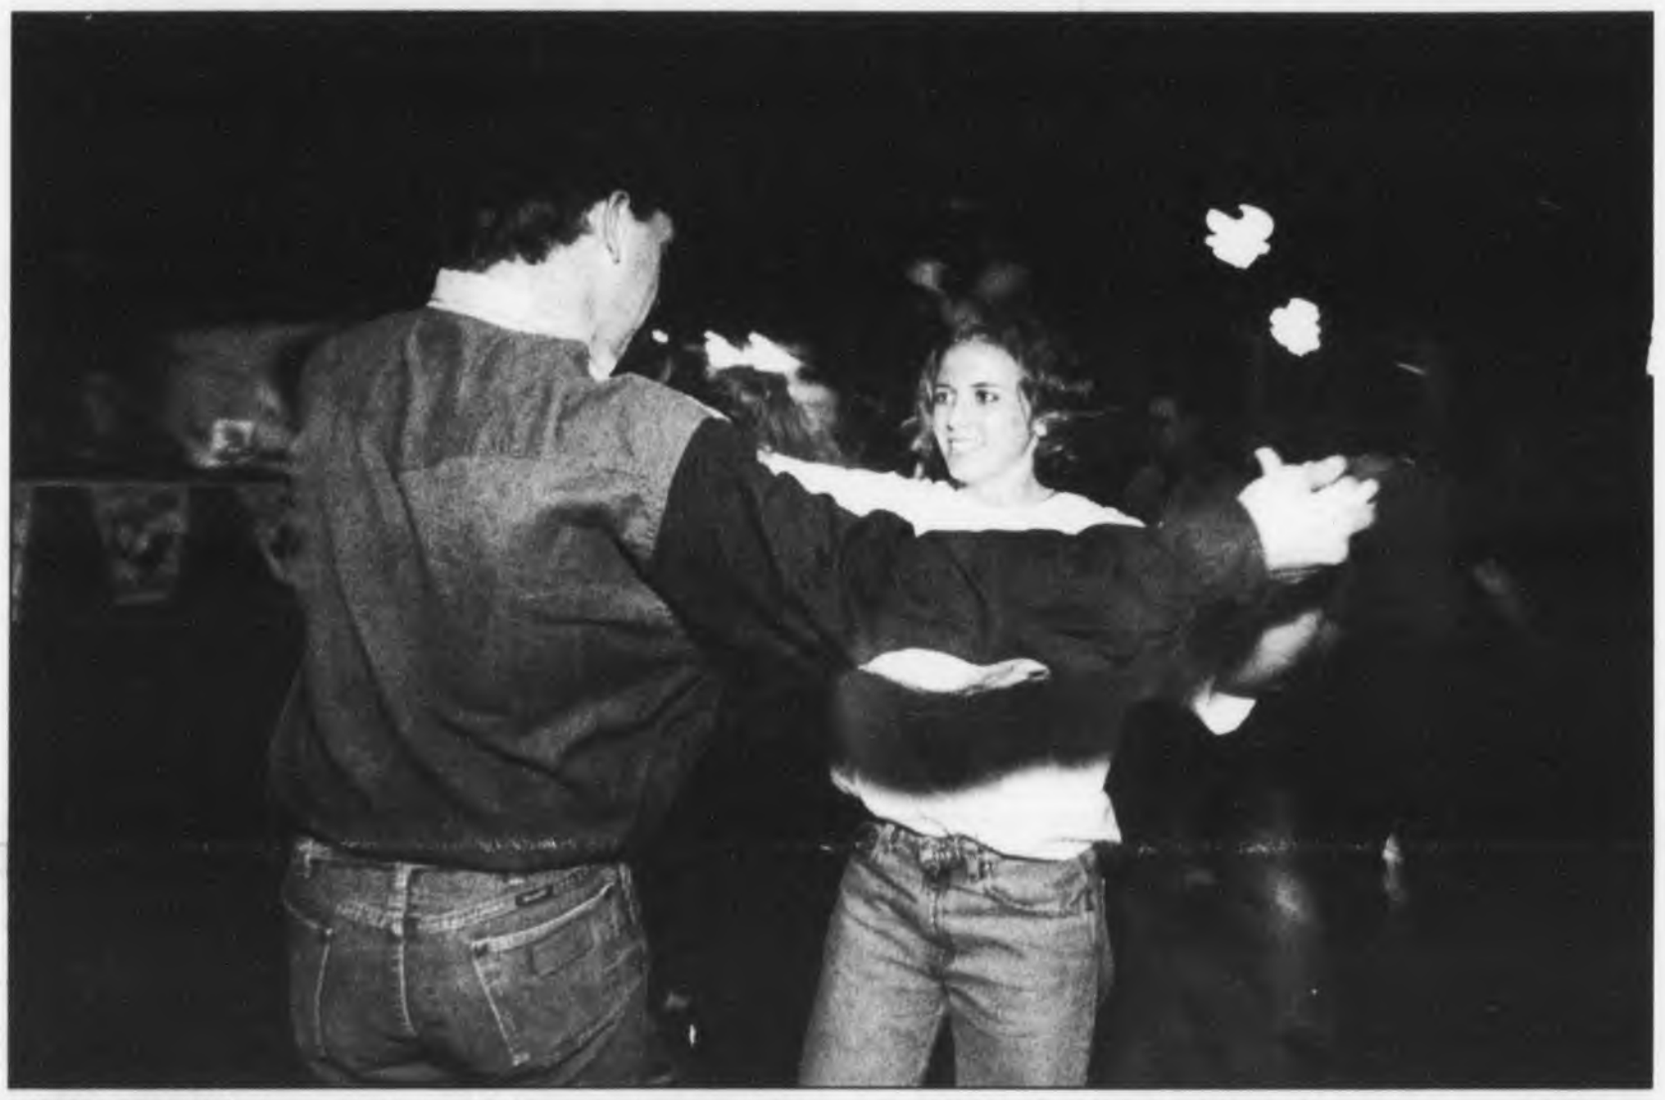
But Kent Hampton, faculty adviser of Students for the Right to Life, said it's important that people receive the whole story and not the part that supports someone's ideological view.

"The way they are promoting it is that it prevents a fertilized egg from implanting in the uterine wall by diffusion," Hampton said. "It's not being sold that way. It's being sold as a contraception when there has already been a conception."

Judy Davis, director of the Women's Resource Center, remained indifferent about the issue.

"This has been a medical question, and it has been settled," Davis said.

Barry said the new information about morning-after pills will enhance contraception discussion.



"We will enhance information to women to make sure the information is covered in discussion regarding contraception," Barry said. "I'm sure we'll use it for the benefit of the students."

Country-dancing lessons give students chance to learn despite tennis shoes, lack of partner

The pulse of country music and the sound of laughter fill the dance floor when people of all ages circle around in their cowboy boots and their tennis shoes.

Each Tuesday night at TW Longhorn's in Aggieville, dance instructor Bert Manning teaches a class in country swing dancing at no cost to the participants.The largest turnout she said she has witnessed was a class of more than 200, but usually the numbers are much lower.

Lessons at Longhorn's run in progressive sessions that last seven weeks, but anyone is invited to join at any time.

"People can come in before class, and I'll help them catch up," Manning said.

The participants learn everything from the basic elements of swing dancing to advanced steps and styles.

In addition to learning the popular country two-step, participants are taught how to waltz correctly.

Manning said she refuses to teach line dances except for a few exceptions, such as the Cotton-Eyed Joe.

"Dance floors are too small," she said.

Manning teaches her students to circle the dance floor, leaving plenty of room for other dances to take place in the middle.

She said her greatest pleasure comes in passing on the art form of dancing to people eager to learn. The fun of dancing is stressed at Manning's lessons, and participants can come without partners, she said.

Kay Lynn Summervill, sophomore in social work, attended a lesson.

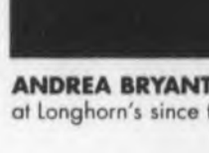
"If I get good at this," she said, "I'll even buy boots."

While country dancing might be popular in Manhattan, other dance lesson options are available.

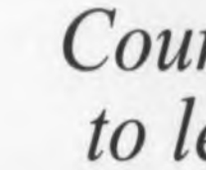
Michael Bennett, an adviser in the College of Architecture, Planning and Design at K-State, began teaching ballroom dancing lessons at K-State in 1988.

He and his partner, Sara Saunders, teach two full classes now totaling 110 participants. Ages range from teens to older adults.

The fox trot, tango, waltz, American swing and some Latin-American dances are taught during the 13-week session.



"We just have a wonderful time," Bennett said.



He said he is thrilled with the great response to ballroom dancing and encourages everyone to give it a try.

Anyone can enroll for the next session, which will be starting sometime in June through UFM.

The cost is $30 per person, and it is not necessary to sign up with a partner.

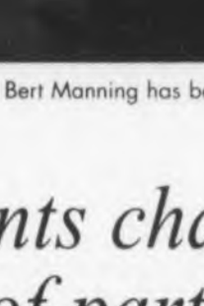
Elections Committee denies use of false names on official ballot

SANDY DAVIS
staff writer

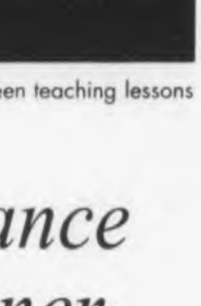
The Elections Committee decided this year that all candidates running for election must use their own last names for the ballot.

Sean Asbury, chairman of the Elections Committee, said that previously candidates signed up for the elections using their legal names. Candidates then specified what name they wanted to use on the ballot.

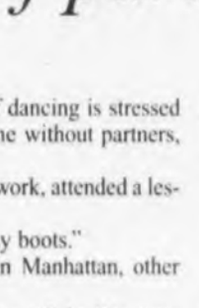
This year student body president and vice president candidates John Farrell, pre-professional in secondary education, and Mark Moessner, senior in architectural engineering, wrote that they wanted to appear on the ballot as Aaron Otto and Amy Knedlik, who are also candidates for student body president and vice president, respectively. To distinguish themselves from Otto and Knedlik, Farrell and Moessner spelled the names on the ballot one letter differently.



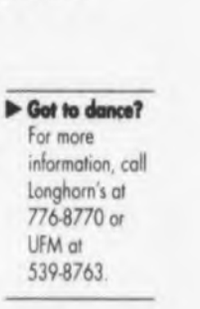
Farrell said that the Election Committee's decision that all candidates must use their own names came as a surprise to him because precedence has let other candidates use different names.



"People have done it in the past, and I don't know why it's any different this year," Farrell said.



Asbury said the candidates could file a grievance to have a tribunal look at the decision.



Bryan Wagner, chancellor of the tribunal, said that if the candidates officially file an Elections Grievance Complaint, a hearing will be scheduled and the tribunal will look at the complaint to see if the Elections Committee's decision should be overturned.

Farrell said he intends to challenge the decision.

• SUSPECTED BOMB MATERIALS TURN OUT TO BE CLEANSER.

DALLAS — The FBI dropped a nationwide terrorist-threat advisory after a U-Haul truck suspected of carrying the makings of a huge bomb turned out to be loaded with baking powder.

The advisory was posted after witnesses said two men had loaded the truck with 30 gallons of diesel fuel and blue containers of what appeared to be thousands of pounds of fertilizer.

Together, they could make a bomb similar to the one that killed 168 people at the Oklahoma City federal building.

The blue containers turned out to be carrying baking powder for use as an antiseptic in scrubbing floors, a federal law-enforcement official in Washington said Tuesday on the condition of anonymity.

The FBI advisory had noted that Friday is the fourth anniversary of the raid on the Branch Davidian compound near Waco, Texas.

In the raid, six cult members and four agents of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms were killed.

• 2 GROUPS CLAIM RESPONSIBILITY FOR CLINIC, CLUB BOMBINGS.

ATLANTA — A letter purportedly from a group called the Army of God claimed responsibility for bombings at an Atlanta abortion clinic and a gay nightclub, and threatened total war against the federal government.

The letter was one of two claims of responsibility for Friday's bombing at the Otherside Lounge that injured five people.

Federal agents were examining a message left Saturday on the voice mail of the Phoenix-based Gay Community Yellow Pages.

The message claimed that the Sons of Confederate Klan, a new neo-Nazi KKK organization from Los Angeles, had bombed the club.

The message did not mention the attacks last month on the abortion clinic.

• BOMB EXPLODES, KILLS 2 ON BUS IN NORTHWEST CHINA.

BEIJING — A bomb planted on a public bus killed two people and injured at least 21 on Tuesday, the latest violence in the northwest region troubled by Muslim separatist riots.

The explosion occurred in Urumqi, the capital of Xinjiang, at about 6 p.m., police and transportation officials said. Authorities refused to speculate on who might have planted the bomb. An investigation was under way.

• SUSPECT HELD IN SLAYING OF 67-YEAR-OLD WOMAN.

WESTMORELAND — A suspect was being held Monday in the slaying of a 67-year-old woman whose body was found in pieces along a creek, a newspaper reported Monday.

Police found Rose Gallagher's dismembered body Saturday in a creek about 400 yards east of her home while investigating a report that she was missing, the Manhattan Mercury said in its Monday editions.

The suspect, a neighbor of Gallagher's, was being held in connection with the slaying, but no charges had been filed Monday afternoon.

Westmoreland is about 30 miles north of Manhattan in northeastern Kansas.

• 18 ARRESTED IN SUSPECTED HAZING AT VIRGINIA COLLEGE.

SALEM, Va. — Police arrested 14 Roanoke College students and four former students Tuesday after officers found them holding down four blindfolded students in an icy creek in an apparent hazing.

"They said they were going through a bonding experience," said police Lt. G.W. Roche. "That's usually called hazing."

The blindfolded students were shivering but otherwise unhurt after they were brought out of the 37-degree, 6-inch-deep Carvins Creek.

KSU PARKING SERVICES
108 Edwards Hall 532--PARK (7275)

With spring just around the corner, our thoughts turn to... Bicycles! There has been much activity concerning bicyclists and non-bicyclists alike. Through a cooperative effort with the City of Manhattan, the Bicycle Master Plan was developed. This plan not only deals with bike lanes and parking on campus, but across the city as well. Because of the wide impact this plan has, plans are underway to host a Bike Fair sometime near Spring Break. We will be inviting representatives from the bike shops in Manhattan and individuals to answer questions regarding the bike plan. You will also have an opportunity to meet the new bicycle patrol officer from University Police. Watch the Collegian for future information regarding the date, time and location.

On a related note, we have a guest columnist. Phil Anderson, a member of the Council on Parking Operations, forwarded the following remarks. Phil is also the Chair of the Sub- Committee on Bicycles. The Council on Parking Operations meets the third Thursday of each month during the fall and spring semesters. The subcommittee meets independently and reports to the Council.

The KSU Parking Council has been concerned with conflicts arising from the dramatic increase in bicycle traffic during the past several years and has begun to take steps to make our campus more safe and convenient for everyone's use. The Sub-Committee on Bicycles, established the Kansas State University Bicycle Regulations which calls for the registration of all bicycles on campus and provides for a set of rules. At the urging of former Student Body President Ed Skoog, the Parking Council agreed to keep bicycle registration free so as to encourage bicycle use as a means of transportation and to help alleviate the demand for automobile parking. There are three reasons why bicycles should be registered:

1. Registration provides a way for law enforcement to recover your bicycle in the event it is stolen. Dozens of bicycles have been recovered by law enforcement in the past several years.

2. Registration will help the University in planning the development of adequate bicycle facilities. If all bicyclists register, the University has easy access to the demographic information necessary for planning.

3. Registration provides a means of informing riders of the Rules and Regulations. Like buying a parking permit, the exchange provides a way for the University to place the rules and regulations in the hands of bicyclists.

Recently, the University has also hired a bicycle patrol officer whose duty is to educate, monitor and enforce the bicycle regulations. You'll probably see Oscar Ruiz on campus more often as the weather warms up. Although there has been some resistance to our efforts, many bicyclists have registered their bicycles and do follow the proscribed regulations. But others do not. All bicyclists should register their bicycles at Parking Services, 108 Edwards Hall. Registration is free.

Senate funds groups despite senator pleas

BENJAMIN YODER
staff reporter

Student Senate allocated money to seven University Activities Board groups Thursday, but not before a senator spoke against the allocation process.

Senate will fund special events for the Black Student Union, Bangladesh Student Association, Women's Center, Disabled Student Services, African Student Union, FONE Crisis Center and UFM next fall.

Arts and Science Senator Craig Korth said the fee system should be restructured, but admitted he knew the allocations would pass.

"I'm trying to give food for thought for the fall," Korth said.

Korth said some UAB groups are self-sufficient and require no funds from Senate.

"Why can't the other groups raise their dues?" Korth asked. "How come we're not cutting anything?"

He said it was not fair for the entire student body to pay for clubs that only benefit a small portion of the students.

"I'm not against the clubs," Korth said. "I'm only against the funding of them."

Sean Tomb, arts and sciences senator, said groups deserve funds. He said he was culturally enriched because he attended an event.

"Most of the groups do a really good job for the campus," Tomb said. "We need to worry about restructuring a fee later."

Before Korth's debate, Senate discussed the funding of each group.

The FONE Center was allocated almost $14,000 up from $10,725 last year. The increase will pay an additional staff member and increased phone costs.

Senate Allocations Chair Bret Glendening said the number of calls the center receives has continued to increase each year. He also said the center provides a needed service for the University.

Senate also allocated more than $14,000 to UFM.

UFM helps support the Lou Douglas Lecture Series. It also offers a variety of non-credit classes to K-State students.

"UFM provides a great service to this campus," Glendening said.

The FONE Center and UFM were the only groups to ask for more than $10,000.

The five other groups requested less than $2,000 each.

BERNADETTE SIMPSON, child psychologist for the Pawnee Mental Health Center, listens to discussion from Almaz Rufael, director of dietetics at both Mercy Health Centers, during a panel forum at the K-State Student Union Tuesday. The panel discussed nutrition, mental health, sexual health and the importance of behaviors reinforced by upbringing.

HEALTHY HABITS

Lack of care puts black community at risk

All human beings have the same general needs to maintain healthy minds and bodies.

Bernadette Simpson, child psychologist for the Pawnee Mental Health Center, said black people are, however, less likely to seek out professional health care.

"Based on my experience, we as a people tend to feel suspicious of health-care organizations. Things that might be easily treated get left alone," she said.

Simpson was one of three African American health-care officials who came to speak Tuesday night in a panel forum. The forum was part of K-State's celebration of Black History Month. The panel covered nutrition, mental health, sexual health and the importance of behaviors reinforced by upbringing.

"Even though preventive health-care measures have improved over the years, African Americans have been left behind," said Jacqueline Mintz, nurse practitioner at Konza Prairie Community Health Center in Junction City. "We're not as knowledgeable as we should be."

Almaz Rufael, head dietician for both Mercy Health Centers, emphasized the importance of nutrition for young people. She said the earlier people can establish good eating habits, the less they need to worry about health risks later.

"We don't listen to our bodies like we should," she said. "Food is meant for energy, not comfort. We should eat when we're hungry, but only when we need it."

African Americans, like most Americans, eat too much meat and not enough fruits, vegetables or grains, Rufael said.

People only need about three ounces of meat per day, with two to three servings of dairy products and fruits or vegetables, and four to five servings of grains a day, she said.

People that put off eating until the late evenings and only eat on the go have unhealthy eating habits, Rufael said.

"We're always on the run, and eating is the last thing on our minds," she said.

Vitamins are useful as supplements, but that's all they're good for, she said. "Your primary energy source is food," she said. "Vitamins have no calories."

Mintz pointed out that an annual physical at a local clinic or hospital can make all the difference.

Blood work at each physical can check for diseases and nutritional deficiencies such as anemia, she said.

Healthy habits are taught by healthy communities, but many communities aren't close enough to teach their children, and this is especially dangerous when habits concerning sexuality aren't taught, she said.

"Education about sexually transmitted diseases is going on, but African Americans just aren't being hit hard enough," she said. "The end of high school is too late. We need to teach them at the middle-school level."

Simpson said sexuality is a subject of embarrassment among parents, who are reluctant to tell their children all they should know.

"Children will learn from other sources if the line of communication between parent and child isn't kept open," she said.

Parents set the example by which children learn healthy or unhealthy habits, Mintz said. The village that helps raise the child can be recreated by the parent who takes the initiative, she said.

College students can protect themselves by educating themselves about the dangers of diseases such as AIDS, and can help younger children through Big Brothers and Big Sisters, Simpson said.

Mental health can influence physical health and vice versa, she said.

"When you feel good," she said, "you take care of yourself."

Promise of pet care pays for students' rent, tuition

JILL JARSULIC
staff reporter

K-State veterinary medicine students will soon be able to earn money for college expenses simply by doing what they love.

Perpetual Pet Care is a program sponsored by the College of Veterinary Medicine that endows scholarships for students who agree to take care of donors' pets in the event of death.

"As practicing veterinarians, we frequently encounter folks who live alone, and whose family is restricted to their pet," said Richard DeBowes, head of the Department of Clinical Sciences at Vet Med. "This could be the 86-year-old widow, or the 29-year-old kid with AIDS, it could be any one of a number of people.

"Perpetual Pet Care will allow those individuals who have that concern about their pet to pre-plan for the daily husbandry care, medical care, love and affection that their pet needs."

Clients enter into an agreement with the college and the KSU Foundation that allows them, through insurance or state planning devices, to set up a fund for student scholarships.

Students will adopt the pet, and will be given a monthly scholarship stipend paying for the cost of college living. The stipend could pay for books, rent or tuition.

Cost of pet care in most cases would be covered by the Vet Med teaching hospital.

There are similar programs at other universities.

"We have bench marked our program from similar ones at Texas A&M and Purdue University," DeBowes said.

But, the program at Texas A&M included building a residence hall to house the students and their pets.

DeBowes said one of the advantages is the tailor-made aspect.

"The individual parties can tailor the daily care of their pets," he said.

"If I were a senior, and Fluffy was my dog, if I like to walk her twice a day, or Fluffy liked to play with a red squeeze toy, then I could put all that down on paper."

Animals would benefit because their routine would remain, although they had been displaced.

Students benefit by gaining experience with animals and learning to love the animals.

"You wouldn't want to take your child to a pediatrician that hated kids," DeBowes said. "This way, the student has an opportunity to learn about what pet care involves."

There are a couple of families who have already expressed interest in the program, but Perpetual Pet Care is still in its infant stages.

Morning-after pill fails as viable birth control option

The government has ruled the morning-after pill can be an effective means of preventing pregnancy, provided it is taken up to 72 hours after unprotected sex — but don't go popping the pills just yet.

The morning-after pill, which is actually high doses — two to four at a time — of certain ordinary birth control pills, is only effective 75 percent of the time.

Don't be fooled into thinking this is a fool-proof alternative to regular birth control, which is 99-percent effective when taken properly, or abstinence, which is 100-percent effective.

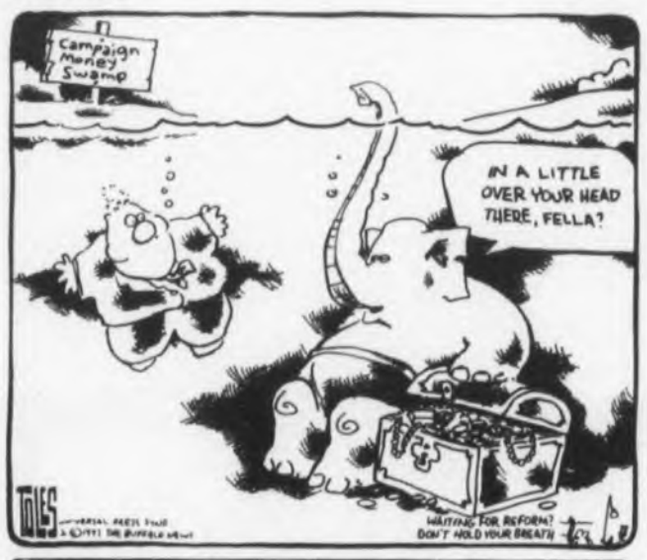
It should be known that this is an option but it should not be considered the easy way out.

Before it comes down to sex, couples should be educated about aspects of birth control — condoms, regular birth control pills and abstinence.

More information can be found on the Internet at (http://www.fda.gov) or by calling Lafene Women's Clinic at 532-6554.

In cases where women are already on birth control or are already pregnant, the morning-after pill will have no effect.

The morning-after pill should not become just a women's issue.



It takes two to tango and before couples take the big dance, all birth control options should be discussed so the morning after is a pleasant one.

student art LOOKING for a home

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

RUSSELL FORTMEYER is a senior in architectural engineering. You can e-mail comments to Russell at (rmf@ksu.edu).

False accusations aside, this campus has an art gallery problem.

I've written about current issues with the Union art gallery and the increasingly minimal space art students have to show their original work. If the issues haven't focused on art students, it is because they are not the people making the decisions about gallery space on this campus. Perhaps this is why there have been problems as of late.

To put it bluntly, art students, or at least the large majority of them, are a bit too apathetic to want real change on this campus.

Complaints about gallery space abound and yet no art student has come up with a creative solution.

A dear friend of mine who attends a small liberal arts college in Kansas got so fed up with the lack of gallery space on her campus that she, her friends and her art department created their own space in a vacant downtown building.

Hmm. Vacant downtown building. We don't have any of those, do we? Alternative spaces abound in this town.

Last year, a group of art students had a show in their house. It was a novel idea that was successful and raised many an artistic profile — and yet the concept is lost.

Students regularly show in Aggieville coffee shops, but truthfully, the coffee shop atmosphere de-emphasizes the art and turns it into more of a decorative art or background conversation piece.

Some graduate art students have become quite politically active in their recent attempt to stave off the commercial contractors who toyed with the idea of scrapping the Union art gallery. Think of the possibilities if the entire student arts community were as active in the campus political process throughout the year.

Alternative gallery space need not be museum quality, nor should it be expected to be available for a four-week run. It should simply have enough wall space and low rodent population for some art to be thrown up long enough to have a reception. It would be an art happening, similar to a rave.

Of course, there's always the issue of security. However, if your art is only up for the duration of the happening, what does security matter?

I would take credit for this idea, but it's as old as the hills. To think our lackadaisical student arts community can't run with it is almost reason enough to move to Lawrence.

There is no reason undergraduate students should wait for their bachelor of fine arts show to begin showing their art. The only reason the art department can't offer them more opportunities for showing is because of the lack of gallery space on campus. It's not that the art department wouldn't like to increase its students exposure.

The obstacle that must be overcome is the concept that a student art show must be up for more than one day. I will agree the longer a show is up, the more people will see it. But gallery openings draw large crowds in this town and a well-advertised art happening would surely do the same.

And if you do only draw 30 people instead of a possible 60, isn't the fact people are seeing your art reason enough?

Finding the space shouldn't be a problem. This rag-tag campus offers many possible interesting space solutions.

There's an actual hayloft in Holton Hall that is semi-accessible. Wouldn't that be an interesting gallery?

Anderson Hall's hallway is practically empty, save the Kansas Board of Regents pictures and newspaper clippings. What better place to show off student work than the campus building many of our high-profile guests and potential students visit most?

And I ask the question that seems to never die: What's that dog kennel on the northern part of campus used for?

I've never heard about any K-State dog program, and yet we have a kennel. Even if there are dogs in the kennel, how does that prevent a student from showing art? Besides, who wouldn't have a good time if you could enjoy the art while playing fetch.

When the weather is nicer, nothing prevents people from taking their art outside. Many open-air markets in larger cities regularly feature artists hawking their wares.

On a visit to a thriving arts city like New York or San Francisco, it is nearly impossible to avoid street artists willing to sell you an etching of a civic monument. Not to say student artists should swallow their pride and begin drawing the Anderson bell tower for fun and profit.

Definitely not. To think our art students would become active members of our community would be expecting too much.

BILL KRAAI/Collegian

Voicing concerns

Columnist answers common questions about news coverage

VIEWPOINT

MARY RENEE SMITH

MARY RENEE SMITH is a sophomore in speech & theatre. You can e-mail your comments to Mary at (mojo@ksu.edu).

Everywhere on campus, much of the buzz is about the Collegian. The Collegian not only reports the news, more often than not, the Collegian is the news.

The one widely held opinion about campus life you will never read about on the opinion page is the general disappointment in the Collegian. For me to say anything negative about the Collegian is biting the hand that feeds me.

If a columnist ever dares to write about the Collegian, it's only to tell readers to get more involved with the paper or to try and explain freedom of the press or freedom of speech.

But the Collegian never addresses the true feelings of some of our readership. A number of people think the Collegian, well for lack of a better word, sucks. Some of the letters to the editor have used much more colorful language that I can't use without being offensive.

Here are some of the common complaints I hear around town: Who is Associated Press and why is he writing so many stories? The columnists are too controversial. There is too much sports news in the paper. The columnists are stupid. There is too much greek news in the paper. The columnists have too many opinions. There are too many ads in the paper. The columnists are not in touch with the real world. There are too many photos in the paper. The columnists should be shot on sight.

I hear these complaints all the time.

Some of them I share with you.

Associated Press pieces are news stories that come from different Associated Press news bureaus around the world. AP, as it is called in the newspaper world, is used for two things.

Most importantly, AP is used to give coverage for important events which can't be reported on by the staff. The Collegian can't have reporters in Washington, Bosnia and Los Angeles, but important stuff does happen there. The other reason AP is used is that sometimes we have space to fill. If there isn't enough local and campus news, we've got to put something on the page.

What can we do to change that? Call in story ideas, e-mail story ideas, come in with story ideas. The Collegian doesn't always know what's going on. (You are not surprised, are you?) If you know of something interesting, important or amusing going on around town, call in.

As for there being a great deal of ads in the paper, I agree. That is really biting the hand that feeds me. The Student Publications Inc. fee all students pay does not pay for the paper entirely. The rest of the cost is made up by selling advertising.

Essentially, the news is what's put in the space leftover after the ads are sold. That space is called a news hole. I'm not making that up; that's how all newspapers work. The amount of news we get is what fits in the space that wasn't sold to advertisers. That's why sometimes there is a bunch of news and sometimes there isn't.

Sometimes there's a huge news hole and not enough news to fill it. Photographers come to the rescue. Enter what's called the feature photo, like a cute picture of children playing in a park or a woman on a bicycle.

I have saved the favorite complaint about the paper for last — columnists. Everyone loves to hate the columnists. Be it an opinion columnist or a sports columnist, this has got to be one of the most dangerous jobs on campus, right after Parking Service employees.

It's dangerous to have an opinion. Actually, it's not dangerous to have an opinion, it's dangerous to voice an opinion.

We are sometimes offensive. But that is what an opinion page is. Sure, an opinion page is supposed to tackle issues, but the line between what is an offensive issue and what is just offensive is a matter of, well, opinion. Forty years ago, civil rights were offensive. A black man marrying a white woman wasn't an issue, it was just plain offensive to most.

Sometimes columns run that are downright stupid. I'm sorry. This is a job like any other job. Sometimes we do great work and sometimes we don't.

There are good things about the Collegian.

Most of the time we do a fairly good job of covering the many events going on around campus. The ads are well designed and eye-catching. The photography is award-winning.

If there is something you don't like about the Collegian, change it. You pay the fee, you are the real boss.

When the crossword was moved to the middle of the page, you called, you e-mailed, and it moved back to the old location.

The Collegian has heard your voice about this page too. You have written, called and contacted the right people. The columnists have been informed of an effort by the editorial staff to produce a more non-offensive opinion page with columns that have more of a point.

I'll do my part.

After all, this is my job, and you are the boss. I hope we aren't silencing our voice on the issues of the future.

• WORKERS IN SERVICE INDUSTRIES NEED APPRECIATION.

Editor,

Thank you Ken Wells, for your appreciation of service-industry workers. Although I haven't had a service job for a while, I have held many jobs of that type in the past. So I'll just say thanks on behalf of all of them.

We appreciate the customers who smile and say thank you, or understand when there is a mistake.

Another overlooked category of service workers are those unsung heroes of cleanliness — janitors (or housekeepers or whatever the facility calls them).

They too are doing an often thankless job (I should know, I've been there) to the best of their ability. But housekeepers in hospitals and nursing homes often have a lot of interaction with patients and appreciate when families take notice of their efforts.

So thanks again. And all the rest of you, smile at that waitress and say thanks.

• CONDOM AWARENESS WEEK TAKES PREVENTION IN WRONG DIRECTION.

Editor,

Let us talk about Condom Awareness Week, about safe sex and about AIDS prevention.

I do not understand how people can put their trust in safe-sex campaigns. Safe sex is an oxymoron. There is no such thing.

The truth about condoms is that they are 90 percent effective in preventing pregnancy. Not AIDS, pregnancy.

When you are having sex, how many people can get pregnant? Only one. How many people can contract the AIDS virus? Both. During a 30-day period, there are only a few days in which a woman can become pregnant (if everything happens just right).

However, you can contract the AIDS virus all 30 days. So, what are the chances of one getting AIDS during that time period? Maybe you will, maybe you will not. Those are terrible odds, especially when you consider that the AIDS virus is 1/25 the size of one sperm, which renders the condom basically useless. Last week was Condom Awareness Week. Be aware.

So what are we supposed to do? Is it not the popular belief now that we can not be expected to not have sex? We need to have sex. It is part of our life. That belief is one of the most ridiculous things I have ever heard.

People do not need sex. People need love.

Love is not sex, and sex is not love. Do not get them confused. True love waits! Sex is a great thing. It is a gift from God, but only in the bounds of marriage. Do not settle for anything less than true love.

We love because God first loved us. Find your fulfillment in letting God love you, and you will have an abundant life. Try praying, try spending time reading the Bible, build a relationship with Jesus.

That relationship will be a lot happier. We do not need more safe sex campaigns or Condom Awareness Weeks. We need Jesus.

• READER URGES CHANGES IN ATTITUDES TOWARD MALE-FEMALE RELATIONSHIPS.

Editor,

After reading both Page Getz's column and Marlene Howell's letter to the editor, I've come to realize that in our society, paternalism is so pervasive that women are effectively reduced to submissive dependent playthings by sexually insecure, power-driven men.

But as women learn more about male/female interdynamics, I wonder how any man can respond to the new woman.

Until our society restructures its power imbalance, relationships are hopeless.

Sexism runs so deep, even our concept of God is tainted by its controlling, misogynist message.

Can love ever be politically correct?

For women to get through to men on a meaningful psychological level, they must realize that the man's macho pose is simply an overcompensation for a little boy's plea for mommy.

While in the arms of their lover, many women may start to question the very nature of human sexuality. However, when relationships fail, it is often unclear whether it is due to the male's immaturity or the female's need for politically correct perfection.

In doing so, the woman often makes an error in judgment and misses the fact that their lover may really have the soul of an artist trapped in the body of a classic infantile-regressive.

Women are doomed by their own superior intellect.

Perhaps we all can learn from this hopelessly unequal relationship; the lesson being that no woman should ever underestimate the male capacity for irrational behavior.

DENNIS WILSON, right, director, leads the KSU Concert Jazz Ensemble during its performance Tuesday night at the Manhattan Center for the Arts.

Concert jazzed with energy

STORY BY RACHAEL KRUEGER • PHOTOS BY MICAH ARMBRUSTER

Music Review

Smiles passed between audience members. Smiles passed between performers. Feeling good was the focus of Tuesday night's performance at the Manhattan Center for the Arts.

With the energetic guidance of Dennis Wilson, director of jazz, the KSU Concert Jazz Ensemble impressed all with their talent.

Wilson, who wrote or arranged six of the 10 songs performed, drew in the audience by recounting the history surrounding each song.

What won the hearts of the audience was the improvisational skills of the musicians.

The most unusual performance of the night went to Tony DiSanza, director of percussion, on drums.

During "Rhythms From the Flint Hills," a piece Wilson finished a week ago, DiSanza produced rhythms on Middle Eastern and West African drums that left the audience in awe.

Each piece featured a different ensemble member, none of whom failed to delight both Wilson or the audience.

A flute is not a jazzy instrument in many eyes. Wrong.

Flutist Sonja Hannington and her solo spoke with syncopation and style. So did her saxophone solo.

Staci Blackwell, senior in social sciences, added a bluesy vocal component in two selections. Beautiful.

Soul grooving bass lines from Michael Brown, junior in physics, and Jena Pralle, junior in music education, emphasized the beat to perfection.

Wilson treated the audience with the sounds of his purple slide trombone, establishing his mark on jazz once more. The point of Wilson's finger was the only preparation members had to ready themselves for a solo on more than one occasion.

SONJA HANNINGTON, lead alto, performs a flute solo during the KSU Concert Jazz Ensemble Tuesday night.

At one point everyone left the stage with the exception of Brian Brooks, senior in marketing, on drums. This was not a planned event. It emphasized the fun nature of the group.

Because of the obvious talent each member possessed separately, together they filled the room with such sounds that your foot couldn't help but tap.

The only flaw of the evening was that it wasn't a full house. It should have been.

Students and Manhattan residents have nothing to complain about when it comes to jazz.

Navajo tradition described through song, woven rugs

RACHAEL KRUEGER
staff reporter

Spiderwoman had an important role in Navajo Indian culture.

The startling beauty of her woven rugs inspired Navajo women of long ago to continue such an art.

That began the tradition of Navajo weaving that remains strong today.

Everyone can share in this tradition at 7 tonight in the Manhattan Center for the Arts.

Alice George, Navajo weaver and singer, and Frances Vitali, storyteller and flutist, will perform weaving songs, tell stories and explain the history of weaving.

George's family raises sheep to provide wool for weaving. Examples of this wool will be available at the presentation.

"Everyone helps out," George said.

Audience members will have the chance to see many of George's weaving tools that were passed down from preceding generations.

Many woven samples ranging from pillows and rugs to hair decorations and clothing will be displayed.

Most of the articles were made by George and her mother.

"I still can't do that," George said, pointing to a difficult pattern in her mother's rug.

There is always room for improvement despite her years of experience, she said.

George's mother taught her to weave at age 9.

George followed in the traditional footsteps of Navajo women by teaching her 9-year-old granddaughter to weave.

Those attending the presentation are encouraged to bring their own rugs for George to discuss. Every Navajo community has its own way of making designs, George said.

George said she hopes her audience leaves with a deeper knowledge of Navajo weaving and its background.

"It's kind of an educational experience," Vitali said.

Each woven work is like the signature of the creator, Vitali said.

The designs shown in the works make Navajo weaving unusual.

Vitali pointed out a rug depicting a storm, in which straight-edged patterns and distinct angles represent this effect.

"The tradition and cosmology of the Navajo people are in each rug," Vitali said.

The people who attend this presentation are fortunate, Vitali said.

"It's the opportunity to experience another voice of another culture," she said.

Jury indicts 3 Wichita men for shooting of 19-year-old

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A federal grand jury indicted three Wichita men in the death of a 19-year-old girl who was shot in the back of the head during a robbery of a Wichita sandwich shop, U.S. Attorney Jackie Williams said.

Eric Pearson, 22, Courtney Martin, 20, and Dominic Pearson, 19, were indicted Tuesday in Kansas City, Kan., each on one count of affecting interstate commerce by robbery — a federal robbery charge — and one count of using a firearm during the robbery and causing the death of Amie Montgomery — a federal homicide charge.

The case is charged under the Hobbs Act.

The act makes it a federal crime to affect or obstruct interstate commerce by robbery.

The three were also charged on Saturday in U.S. District court in Wichita with federal robbery and homicide charges.

Williams said authorities decided to bring federal charges against the men because of the outrageousness of the crime and because federal sentencing guidelines are harsher.

Montgomery was killed Feb. 17 when two armed men entered Mr. Goodcents, ordered Montgomery and another employee to lie on the floor, then shot Montgomery in the head.

The other employee was uninjured.

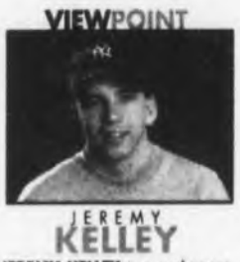
College athletes departing school early leaves them with no education



"Two roads diverged in a road, and I took the one less traveled by."

The one less traveled by.

What possesses college basketball players to leave school early to play in this round-ball ecstasy most call the NBA?

This is a question which has perturbed my thoughts as of late, ever since Kentucky forward Ron Mercer announced that he was thinking about foregoing his last two years to enter this so-called euphoria.

VIEWPOINT

JEREMY KELLEY

JEREMY KELLEY is a sophomore in print journalism. You can e-mail your comments to Jeremy at (weasal1@ksu.edu).

Have athletes lost touch with what is true and serene in this day and age — an education?

Or has society desensitized the world of athletes so much and duped them into thinking that no one needs an education, but rather a pocket full of money.

What's the deal with that?

In my opinion, I feel it is both bogus and sad. Mercer will not make it in the NBA if indeed he is drafted by an NBA team. The kid is a sophomore, and he is in no way ready for the big time.

The road less traveled by.

Mercer has stepped his play up a tad since Derek Anderson exited the Kentucky lineup with an injury, and now he's Mr. NBA?

Nope.

In some cases, you can admire the athletic ability in a few guys who leave early — Kobe Bryant, for instance.

Yeah — he's good.

First off, he's had an effect on a Los Angeles Laker team possessed. Bryant fits in so perfectly with everyone in L.A. because he's a flashy, do-all type of player. He caps his rookie season off with a slam-dunk championship at all-Star weekend.

But the kid is an 18-year-old and, yes, that's what he is — a kid. What would happen if he would somehow rupture his plantar facia tendon in his foot and be gone from basketball, never to return?

> "(Roy) Williams overemphasizes that basketball is merely a tool to display your talents and earn your way through college then succeed in the NBA. Those are simply the facts."

What would he do? The money he's making now will only last for a short period of time, and then he'll fall off the face of the earth. Brandy can only sing for so long before her voice box withers away.

What's even more ironic is that out of all the superior teams in college basketball, not a single player has ever left the friendly confines of Allen Fieldhouse, which houses one of the greatest programs in college basketball history.

North Carolina's Jerry Stackhouse and Rasheed Wallace skipped out on their final two seasons in the Dean-dome to go in the NBA and actually be somewhat of a success. Stackhouse seems right at home with the 76ers and even has his own shoe contract, but Wallace, on the other hand, is struggling to post a starting position with Portland.

The road less traveled by.

I wish those who leave early would follow the example set by a member of Michigan's highly talented Fabulous Five, Juwan Howard, who left his junior year after teammate Chris Webber departed a year earlier.

Please recall with me that in the Fab Five's first two years together, Howard and Webber led Michigan to the NCAA Championship, only to lose to Duke in 1992 and North Carolina in 1993.

Now Howard has set a precedent that all should follow — he graduated with his class at Michigan earning a degree in radio/TV communications and still continues to excel with the Washington Bullets.

Better yet, how about joining Jacque Vaughn's bandwagon who, in the name of Robert Frost, took the road less traveled by, remaining at KU for his final season. Now look what he is doing — almost indefinitely Vaughn will lead KU straight to the NCAA Championship in April.

This poses another question: Will Raef LaFrentz forego his senior season at KU?

Nope.

Roy Williams just doesn't allow his players to do that. Williams stresses the finer things in life, like getting an education and earning a degree in some area so that you will have something to fall back on if life in the NBA doesn't pan out.

Williams overemphasizes that basketball is merely a tool to display your talents and earn your way through college then succeed in the NBA. Those are simply the facts.

"Two roads diverged in a wood, and I took the one less traveled by and that has made all the difference."

It makes sense, doesn't it?

Cats looking to build confidence in pitching

Traylor

JEREMY KELLEY

In its first six games, the K-State baseball team is batting .318 with a slugging percentage of 54 percent and scoring an average of nine runs per outing.

It's no question that the Cats have the hot bat in the beginning of their season. Coach Mike Clark said he just hopes the offense can continue.

"We've been swinging the bats really well," Clark said. "Heath Schesser, Todd Fereday and Scott Poepard continue to give us a life in the middle of our order."

And the numbers speak for themselves.

Those three position players are batting .500, .421 and .360 respectively. K-State wraps up its final non-conference game before heading into Big 12 play today against Doane at Frank Myers Field.

"We really need the guys in front to get on base, too," Clark said. "I've been pretty much pleased with the offense to start the season."

If there is a weak spot in K-State's regime, Clark said it was the lack of defense at certain times in the season.

"Hopefully we'll do better defensively from this point on," he said. "We practice on turf for three days and then go out on dirt, and that's not going to work. Until we got out there and get used to field conditions we won't get better."

Call it old hat, but the Cats' pitching staff has picked up where it left off last year when it led the Big 8 in earned-run-average.

K-State's aces are posting a combined ERA of 3.74. They have tallied 60 strikeouts and have given up just 35 walks in six games.

"It builds confidence for all the pitchers that you just can't explain, because you know you're coming in and doing your job," pitcher David Johnson said after a 6-5 win over Air Force last weekend. "We continue to do that, and we're going to win the Big 12."

Clark said he was going to continue to use a decent number of pitchers as the season wears on just to keep arms warm and to give them a feel for the mound.

"The depth of the pitching staff is more important now, especially heading into the conference," he said. "We have to start preparing guys for complete games."

In today's game, Chris Traylor gets the second start of the season for K-State, but Clark said a new pitcher will see action in every inning to better prepare them for the conference opener this weekend.

Patterson feeling hype surrounding tournament

SUN DEE MILLS
sports writer

The Missouri women's basketball team is sitting in the cellar of the Big 12, with a 10-17 overall record and 1-13 in the conference. Wildcat coach Deb Patterson said playing the Tigers at Hearnes Center tonight would provide a tremendous opportunity for the Cats.

"This is the week for us," Patterson said. "We've got an opportunity, if things go the way I hope they do, to finish as high as fifth in this league."

Patterson was more willing to speculate about the Cats' chance of receiving their first NCAA Tournament bid since 1987 after an important win over Colorado last week.

"It is in our control to win at Missouri and Baylor," Patterson said. "Finishing fifth in the league is a great carrot for our program."

Last week, Patterson said she thought the Big 12 would probably send five teams to the Tournament and possibly six would be invited. This week, Patterson extended her numbers, thus putting the Cats in the running for a bid.

"I think the way the league has evened out and the way top teams have started to compete with some of the mid-range teams, we might be able to stretch it," Patterson said. "I think six teams is beginning to look like a real bet and seven becomes a real opportunistic number for us."

The Cats go into tonight's game in sixth place in the league and with the same conference record as Nebraska and Iowa State. In the Cats' last meeting with the Tigers, the Cats were victorious, 77-42. The Tigers' lone conference win was over Big 12 No. 1 Kansas at the Hearnes Center.

The Cats also cannot overlook Tiger freshman guard Julie Helm. Helm averages 17 points a game, and she managed to score 17 against Kansas last Wednesday.

"There is no way for our team to overlook anything at this point," Patterson said. "We did not perform to the best of our abilities against Kansas."

With the Cats finishing their Big 12 season on the road at Missouri and Baylor, Patterson said the road games will certainly be a challenge the team will have to step up and accomplish.

"If we're going to succeed in the Big 12 Tournament, we need to get wins on the road," Patterson said. "Successful teams can maintain the same mentality at home and on opposing courts. It takes a different mentality to handle hostility and have patience on the road."

Although a NCAA berth hangs in the balance, Patterson said the team is not feeling pressure.

"The team's really not feeling that much pressure, because they have superseded people's expectations," Patterson said. "It's a neat feeling to play with something on the line. These games are as big as we could ask for."

K-State hoping to build some momentum as it closes out conference play this week

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

With its final two games of the regular season at home, the K-State men's basketball team is looking to gain momentum for the Big 12 Tournament next week.

In the Cats' final week, Coach Tom Asbury and the rest of the ball club are looking to do just one thing.

"Earn more points than our opponents," Asbury said. "We're trying to get some wins — the same thing we've been doing all year long."

K-State (9-15, 2-12) is seeded last in the conference, just one game behind Texas A&M, however, with two wins this week over Baylor tonight and Missouri on Saturday, the Cats could get the shot they need in the Big 12 Tournament.

"It's actually our only shot, but it would be wonderful to go into the tournament with momentum," Asbury said. "Some teams want to win more than others — hopefully that will be us come tournament time."

Even after winning a half against the No. 1 team in the country last Saturday only to allow KU to get away from them in the second, signs of improvement are showing for the Cats.

"Oh yeah, in all areas we have improved, but you can just pick up a stat sheet and run your finger down to field-goal percentage and see where we haven't improved," Asbury said.

But before thinking ahead to the tournament, K-State must face a tough Baylor team tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

Baylor (17-10, 5-9) lost a nail biter to Texas A&M Saturday, a game in which the Bears were out rebounded by the smaller Aggies.

For Baylor to record its first conference road win, head coach Harry Miller thinks his team must rebound a bigger, stronger K-State team.

"They've got a lot of size, and they can come off the bench with a lot of size," Miller said. "We're going to have to play great defense too, because they're good at home when they shoot the ball well."

But maybe K-State doesn't have a big size advantage. Baylor's two big men in the center, 6'10" Brian Skinner and 6'10" Doug Brandt are averaging 16 and 11 points respectively.

"The keys for us will be stopping their transition game, contest their threes and stop Mr. Skinner," Asbury said.

On the other hand, Miller said guards Mark Young and Ayome May have been giving K-State some solid point production in the past couple of games.

"Mark Young has really been playing well for them, and that May kid is really coming on, and those kids are capable of giving them point production on the perimeter," Miller said.

Despite K-State's place in the conference, Asbury said his team was improving.

"The guys have been very resilient," Asbury said. "We are getting better. Our record may not be getting better, but we are getting better."

ENERGY BOOSTERS

Vitamin misuse related to health problems

STORY BY CHARLE SIOUX CHARLETON • ILLUSTRATION BY ADRIAN FLEMING

▶ Need more info? For students wishing to improve their eating habits, add variety to their diets and learn more about good health, brochures are available at the Riley County Extension Office, 110 Courthouse Plaza.

Vitamins serve as an energy booster and a dietary supplement. One vitamin daily can make a difference in health and energy levels.

"A multi-vitamin is usually more than enough to cover your needs, but you don't want to cover up bad eating habits," Richard Baybutt, assistant professor of food and nutrition, said.

"Kids don't eat well, and so much development is going on that a vitamin supplement helps."

Baybutt said most people are aware of the food pyramid, but they need to take it a little more seriously. About 33 percent of people will eat only one serving of each food group every day.

"Very few people actually consume the appropriate amounts of food," Baybutt said. "If they could improve their diets by just a couple servings, it would be an improvement over the population in general."

Baybutt said the key is to look at what you eat over one week, and divide it by seven. Then take it one step further. Eating more good foods provides adequate amounts of vitamins and minerals.

The Food and Nutrition Board developed the standards for nutrition based on scientific evidence and information.

"During World War II, the government assigned the Food and Nutrition Board the task to evaluate nutritional needs. Inadequate diets caused deficiencies in too many people, and the military needed healthy men," Baybutt said.

By 1941, the board came up with the numbers needed to prevent deficiency symptoms, he said. Every five years since then the numbers are re-evaluated and reassessed, based on current research.

Certain nutrients in mega doses can be effective. Vitamin C can be effective for colds, he said. On the other hand, high doses of vitamins A and D can be toxic, so people need to be careful and not take large amounts of them.

Fads, though they contain an element of truth and a lot of heresy, may be valid, are not looked into scientifically. Garlic, for example, is beneficial for preventing heart disease and cancer.

"A zinc deficiency will decrease your resistance, but if you take an excess amount that is not a good policy," Baybutt said. "Even the Bible says moderation in all things."

Baybutt's own research looks at nutrients and how they may help prevent the development of certain diseases or lessen their severity. His particular area of expertise is pulmonary hypertension.

Brian Herman, sales associate at General Nutrition Center, said people should take vitamins in combination with eating good food.

"People who eat well are healthier. Take a multi-vitamin and eat a lot of vegetables," Herman said.

People at different ages buy different supplements. Older people buy a lot of garlic. Students want something that gives them energy. Melatonin is still very big, Herman said.

"Around spring break time, people look for weight loss products," Herman said. "Vitamin C is a big seller and so are antioxidants."

A vitamin supplement should not exceed 100 percent of the Recommended Dietary Allowance for the vitamins and minerals per day, according to the brochure "Eat a

New Beach exhibit features midwest landscape art

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Kansas often receives criticism for having no landscape, at least in the mountain-trees vein of the word.

There exists a long tradition of artistic interpretation of the landscape — that age-old pursuit of attempting to find an intangible quality of sanctity in our natural surroundings.

Art Review

Sometimes seen as a wasteland, attitudes toward the Kansas landscape have changed progressively during the past couple decades, what with the creation of the Tallgrass Prairie National Park and several new interpretative nature centers throughout the state.

As a spinoff of this resurrected respect for the land, a subculture of artists has embraced landscape paintings as a way of finding spirituality in earth.

Some of the artists are featured in a new exhibition at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. "Midwestern Romanticism," on the walls until April 6, is a loose look at some of the more popular landscape painters in the Midwest.

It's an exhibit of fascinatingly diverse interpretations of roughly similar landscape throughout the heartland.

Organized by the Springfield, Illinois Art Association, the exhibition includes artists Keith Jacobshagen, James Winn, Donald Lake, Richard Boschulte (who organized the show), James D. Butler, Michael Dubina, Gary Bowling and Brett Angell.

The exhibition seems to be a less-than-focused overview of midwestern landscape painters, especially when considering Lake's work.

Lake's "Industry: Brickyard" (1994), with its ramshackle display of an old industrial yard set against some distinct geometric building forms, is more of an architectural commentary than an homage to an identifiable landscape.

The painting seems to defy Boschulte's catalog introduction where he states "these artists show us the beauty of our surroundings and more, through works ranging from the psychologically moody and foreboding to the spiritually transcendent and triumphant."

However, Lake's "Prairie Sky #8" (1991) makes much more sense in its richly colorful portrayal of the agricultural influences on the land.

The psychologically moody paintings of the exhibition easily prove to be the five Angell works.

Radically departing in style as compared to the others, Angell's gloomy, subdued works in deeply-shaded palettes perhaps evoke the emotion of the Midwest landscape most effectively.

In Angell's "Recovering" (1995), a small boat seems to hover over a small pool of water surrounded by reeds. The painting appears washed over in a somber purple that meets a subtle fiery-yellow horizon.

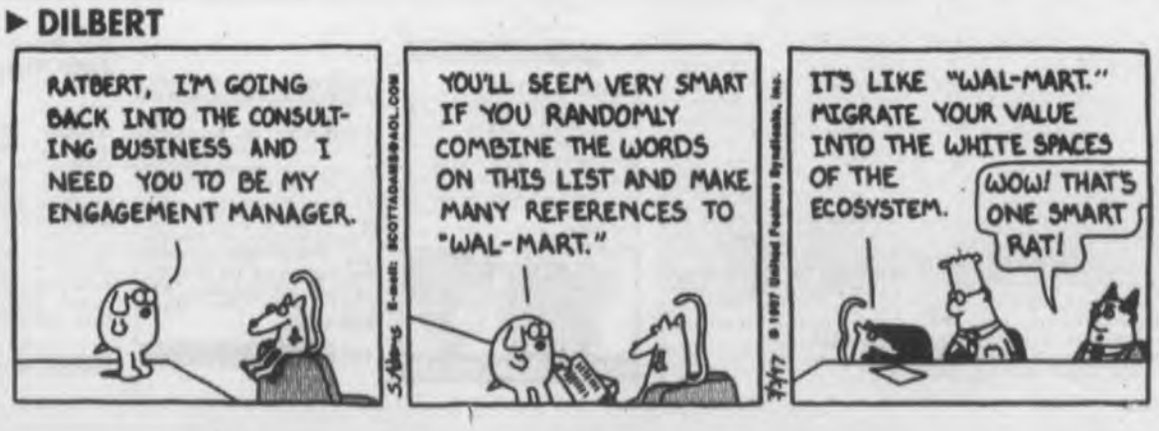
Bill North, curator at the Beach art museum, said Boschulte organized the exhibition to examine the emerging trend of romanticism in Midwestern painting. North said 20 years ago, a painter who pursued landscape painting wouldn't be taken very seriously.

The contemporary landscape scene can be traced to the 1930s and 1940s landscape paintings of John Steuart Curry, Thomas Hart Benton and Grant Wood — three Regionalist painters found in the Beach collection.

"What fascinates me about his work is that, in society in the 1930s and 1940s, there are a lot of similarities to today," North said.

He said movements of neo-nationalism, family values and xenophobia parallel similar movements of the 1930s.

"The Regionalists wanted to construct a mythological past — to hold the agrarian times up as an ideal," North said.



But unlike the Regionalists who used ideal landscapes as a way of conveying a national political platform, North said the contemporary landscape artists' content is much more a universal expression of regional pride.

"They are personal depictions of the landscape filled with spirituality and reverence for the landscape," he said. "They are not advancing certain causes."

If some of the work leaves something to be desired, it could owe to the subtle quality of the work. There are no shocking uses of color or composition, but an almost uniformly horizontal and realistic

SOME DRINK, WELL, LIKE A FISH

BELGIUM – A rite of spring involving a Druid, a goblet, some wine and live fish has raised the ire of some animal rights activists. This little town spent Sunday celebrating its Krakelingen festival, which local historians say was started as early as 500 B.C. as a pagan celebration of life. It all goes according to tradition. The festivities begins with street processions and the re-enactment of medieval scenes depicting the history of the town.

So far so good.

After a costume pageant, the man dressed up as a Druid pours the wine into the goblet, adds a fish or two and presents the laced drink to the mayor and local dignitaries. They are expected to swallow the concoction. That's where the problem starts. Animal rights supporters say the ritual is barbaric, and conducted a small protest. The participants had enough to worry about as it was. Some seemed to find the wriggling drink hard to swallow.

Kansas City band has explosive debut

PHIL KELLUM
staff writer

Kansas City's own Grither has produced a fantastic debut album, and if it is any indication of its live show, it's sure to be explosive.

The band's potent mix of hard and heavy rock with the right amount of melody is sure to win them many new fans.

Music Review

"The First Man on the Sun," on Cherry Disc Records, is full of songs of loneliness and despair.

When listening to it, the band sounds as if it is always on the brink of collapse and chaos, yet it still manages to keep the music focused and controlled somehow. The music is dissonant and always teetering on that always fine line between control and chaos.

Guitarist and vocalist Mike Allmayer is the only member of Grither left in the band who recorded the album. Bassist Mark Reynolds and drummer Tim Mohn both left the band shortly after recording the album.

Allmayer and Reynolds were originally in the legendary Pedaljets from Lawrence. Mohn was in Kill Whitey and Stick.

Mohn and Reynolds have since been replaced by Brian Lynn on bass and Kyle Hudson on drums. They are said to have added to Grither's sound immeasurably.

Lynn and Hudson have very big shoes to fill, judging by the output on this album.

The compact disc kicks off with "Trickledown Justice," which is a hard, dynamic song to get the listener immediately grooving and into the Grither sound. It features some rather interesting effects on Allmayer's tortured guitar.

The range of sounds on the CD goes from hard-driving monsters like "One Piece Missing" to more lush, almost orchestral-sounding numbers like "Confess."

"One Piece Missing" just begs to be played loud and often. It also could inspire some frenzied pogoing and moshing during Grither's live shows. It is one of the best songs on this CD.

The third song, "Sink," has a very anthemic sound to it with loud, ringing guitars and booming drum beats.

"Time" is probably the fastest and most energetic song contained on "The First Man On The Sun." The lyrics, especially the chorus, reflect heartbreak and loneliness to a T with Allmayer screaming, "I need time. Yeah, I need time. All your time!"

I can picture a club packed with people pogoing and screaming along with Allmayer during the chorus.

On "Landlord," the guys slow it down quite a bit and add some different instrumentation into the mix. Chimes and bells are heard in the background along with strings and an organ, showing just what they are capable of doing.

On most of the album, Allmayer's vocals are mixed to the front of the music, but on "Valentine," his vocals are pushed to the back of the mix and the bass, guitar and drums overshadow him. For some, this would be considered a poor mix, but it works on this song beautifully.

The closing track, "Confess," sounds very much like a Smashing Pumpkins outtake, with its restrained delivery, beautiful strings and percussion arrangements. It pulls you in and, before you know it, it's over.

All in all, Grither's "The First Man on the Sun" is a fantastic record.

The band takes the famed Kansas City sound of bands like itself, Season To Risk and Molly Maguire, and push it one step further in the right direction.

Chalk this one up as a winner.

Be sure to check out the live power and sonic attack of Grither this Thursday at Bombers.

They won't disappoint. Allmayer and crew will hit hard and hit often, so watch out.

6-year-old's death places parents as chief suspects in investigation

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOULDER, Colo. — JonBenet Ramsey's parents believe they are the chief suspects in the investigation of their 6-year-old daughter's killing two months ago, a family spokesman said.

"It's clear from what the police and DA's office have said publicly that they consider the Ramseys at the top of their potential suspect list," said Patrick Korten, a Washington, D.C., publicist hired by John and Patricia Ramsey. "There's nothing new about that."

JonBenet, a former Little Miss Colorado, was found strangled to death in the basement of her family's home Dec. 26. John Ramsey found her body about eight hours after her mother discovered a ransom note seeking $118,000. Autopsy reports indicate the girl may have been sexually assaulted.

A judge Monday ruled that the search warrants and related documents in the case will remain sealed for another 90 days, or until an arrest is made.

The parents have yet to sit down for a formal interview with police even though the two sides remain in contact.

"All dealings are through the attorneys," Korten said.

Meanwhile, a newspaper reported police made a second trip to Atlanta in mid-February to check out the alibi for John Andrew Ramsey, 20, JonBenet's half-brother.

The Jefferson Sentinel ONLINE, in a copyright story, quoted an unidentified source as saying police had doubts about the family's claims that John Andrew was in Georgia when the girl was killed. The Jefferson Sentinel ONLINE is the electronic edition of the Jefferson Sentinel weekly.

Sources close to the investigation on Monday told the (Boulder) Daily Camera the second Georgia trip was to recheck several aspects of the case, including John Andrew's alibi, but emphasized it was not the focus of their interviews.

Student, teacher to face off in election

ASSOCIATED PRESS

A high-school student in Hesston came in second in the local mayoral primary election, and will face his government teacher in the general election in April.

Christopher Friesen, an 18-year-old senior, will face government teacher John Waltner, 50, to see who will be mayor of the small central Kansas town.

"He is going about this seriously," Waltner said. "He's not just doing it to get his name in the paper a couple of times. He fully intends to put together the best campaign he can. I don't plan to take it lightly between now and the election. I intend to beat him and will work hard to try to accomplish that."

In Hesston, a town of about 3,000 people, Friesen grabbed 130 votes to finish second behind Waltner, who won Tuesday's race with 246 votes. The two now advance to the April 1 election. Chip DuFriend finished third with 40 votes.

Though happy with the results, Waltner, a three-term Democrat, said he's legitimately concerned about Friesen's showing. Waltner has been mayor since Friesen was in first grade and had never been challenged as an incumbent until this year.

After the returns were counted, Friesen responded to critics who said they can't visualize an 18-year-old as mayor.

"It's not on our age that we're being voted on, but our beliefs and abilities, I believe," Friesen said. Among his campaign promises are welcoming new residents with lower incomes than Hesston's upper-middle-class standard and affirming the community's strong ordinances against selling alcohol.

Both candidates spent much of Tuesday night on the phone talking to news reporters from around the country. Producers of David Letterman's "Late Show" called Friesen to see if he would be interested in appearing on the program.

Both are set to appear today on NBC's "Today" show.

U.S. says Mexican corruption hinders drug war

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President Clinton outlined Tuesday how he wants to spend the 5-percent increase he's seeking from Congress to fight drugs next year as U.S. officials acknowledged the battle has been hampered by recently revealed ties between Mexico's ousted drug czar and narcotics kingpins.

"There is a major corruption problem at all levels (in Mexico) — federal, state and local," Robert Gelbard, assistant secretary of state for narcotics affairs, told a House panel.

The arrest last week of Mexico's newly installed anti-drug official, Gen. Jesus Gutierrez Rebollo, because of his links to a drug trafficker belied previous assumptions that corruption was largely limited to the police, Gelbard said.

Clinton, however, did not directly address the pressing question of Mexico's recertification for anti-drug aid, which must be decided by March 1. He said generally that decisions would be made after Secretary of State Madeleine Albright returned today from her overseas trip.

"We are committed to cooperating with our friends in Latin America," Clinton said. "We want to cooperate with them, but we want them to cooperate with us as well."

Gen. Barry McCaffrey, Clinton's drug czar, called the scandal a serious blow to America's partnership with Mexico, but also signaled the administration's eagerness to get around it.

"The United States and Mexico are trapped economically, culturally, politically and because of drug crime in the same continent and we'd better figure out a way to work on it together," McCaffrey said.

White House spokesman Mike McCurry said the administration was working hard for a decision Friday on Mexico's recertification. Anything more than a slap on the wrist could result in withholding some foreign aid to Mexico.

Administration officials touted Clinton's proposed $16 billion anti-drug budget for 1998 — an $800 million increase from this year — is the largest in the government's history.

Most of the increase, $350 million, will go to a new prime time, public service TV ad campaign aimed at teenagers.

Otherwise, however, the package that Clinton and Vice President Al Gore outlined at a morning ceremony contained no new initiatives.

First proposed last month as part of the president's fiscal 1998 budget, it includes $75 million for drug courts that offer nonviolent drug criminals voluntary alternatives to jail and $42 million to help pay for drug-testing people arrested on federal, state and local charges.

Republican and Democratic lawmakers alike are urging Clinton to decertify Mexico to demonstrate U.S. impatience with the lack of cooperation in the drug war.

"We can't trust these people. That's the whole problem," said Rep. Bob Barr, R-Ga. "Why don't we hold their feet to the fire?"

Thomas Constantine, chief of the Drug Enforcement Administration, said the DEA is now assessing the damage caused by Gutierrez Rebollo, but said, "My assumption is that everything that was available to him has been compromised completely," including information at the agency he took over.

House kills death penalty repeal

▶ Look it up on the World Wide Web. The death penalty bill is HB2169 and is available on the Internet at (http://www.ink.org/public/legislative/full-text-bill.html).

TOPEKA — They invoked the name of the Creator, recited Bible verses and used Jesus as an example.

The buzz of noise in the House chamber was absent, something that happens only when members debate subjects requiring the utmost dignity and earnestness.

As a result of Wednesday's debate on capital punishment, the state's 1994 death penalty law is likely to remain the same for another year.

The House rejected, 34-87, a bill that would have repealed the death penalty law and made the hard 40 — at least 40 years in prison without chance of parole — the maximum penalty for first-degree murder in Kansas.

The bill remains on the debate calendar, but is likely to drop to the bottom and be left there.

The House also rejected, 60-63, a proposed amendment that would have made death by lethal injection the possible penalty for all first-degree murders. The 1994 law lists seven capital crimes, including multiple murders and murders of law enforcement officers, for which death is a possible penalty.

"The House is not ready to abolish the death penalty, but it's not ready to expand it, either," said House Minority Leader Tom Sawyer, D-Wichita, a death penalty opponent. "The House is saying it likes the current law."

Opponents of capital punishment had little hope they would prevail during the debate, but they pressed the issue anyway.

Many supporters of the death penalty welcomed another opportunity to take a roll call vote on the issue.

Curiously, the House did not take a roll call vote on whether to advance the bill to final action, something routine on big issues.

"It wasn't a political deal," said House Majority Leader Robin Jennison, R-Healy. "I don't think there was a real mood to politicize it."

Both sides made their traditional arguments.

Aid priority deadline nears for recipients

TANYA NISLY
staff reporter

Students' chances for financial aid from the government are slipping away.

The priority deadline for students to file for financial aid is Saturday. If students do not have their forms, they can pick them up in Fairchild 104, Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance, said.

If students miss the priority deadline, they can still be considered for financial assistance, but there are drawbacks to waiting.

"We will run out of money. There are limited amounts of money," Moeder said.

He said that the Supplemental Grant, the Perkins Loan, State Regents Grant and the College Work Study are the first methods of aid to run out of funds.

"The Pell Grant and the Federal Direct Student Loan are left after the priority deadline applications are filled," he said.

Lawrence fire threatens history

▶ FIRE RESULTS IN POWER OUTAGE, detours traffic around downtown Lawrence area.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE — Firefighters worked more than two hours Wednesday night on a fire that sent flames shooting from the roof of a historic building in the heart of the university town's downtown.

The fire continued burning after 8 p.m.

The building, housing the health-food store Sunflower Surplus, a bike shop and other businesses may collapse before the fire could be put out, Fire Chief Jim McSwain said at the scene as firefighters battled the blaze that broke out about 6 p.m.

There were no immediate reports of injuries, but power had to be rerouted in parts of downtown.

"You can see the flames licking out the second-floor window," said an employee of the Free State Brewery, located about a block and a half from the fire. The employee would not give his name.

The building had a wood roof, fueling the fire, McSwain said.

Firefighters were trying to keep the flames from spreading to other buildings.

Nearly all the fire equipment available in Lawrence was at the scene. Downtown streets were cordoned off, and power was lost for about 20 minutes during the fire.

Several hundred people were watching as firemen worked on the blaze.

Diverse group of artists collect the coveted Grammy during music award show

STORY BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — From the Beatles to Beck, nine different artists took home multiple Grammys Wednesday in a ceremony that celebrated music's diversity. Even a tone-deaf first lady took home a Grammy.

Multiple award winners included the Beatles, the Fugees, Beck, Sheryl Crow, Eric Clapton, Kenneth "Babyface" Edmonds, LeAnn Rimes, Toni Braxton and Vince Gill.

In a year of no clear trends, it was one song that proved dominant. The composition "Change the World" was responsible for Grammy awards for singer Clapton, its songwriters and producer Babyface.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, saying she was amazed to win for her recording of her book on child rearing, "It Takes a Village," picked up the prize during the pre-telecast presentation ceremony at Madison Square Garden before heading back to Washington for a state dinner.

"I was very surprised, because I didn't even know that the Grammys were given to tone-deaf people like me," said Clinton, recalling an off-key duet she recently performed on "The Rosie O'Donnell Show."

Music's top awards ceremony was moved to the Garden this year and, for the first time, members of the public were admitted to see the televised portion of the 39th annual show.

With three awards on Wednesday, the Beatles nearly doubled their lifetime haul of Grammys. They won for best pop performance by a duo or group for "Free As a Bird," the song manufactured by the three surviving members from a tape left behind by the late John Lennon.

They also won two video awards for "Free As a Bird" and their anthology project. During their peak in the 1960s, the Beatles won only four Grammys.

A tearful country singer, LeAnn Rimes, with a dress to match her hit song, "Blue," won the award for best new artist. The teen singing sensation also won for best female country vocal performance.

"Blue" was also honored as best country song, an award that went to writer Bill Mack.

At 14 years old, Rimes said she was proud to be

• NEW YORK ORDERED TO REDRAW DISTRICTS BY FEDERAL JUDGES

NEW YORK — A panel of federal judges today ordered the New York Legislature to redraw a congressional district, saying it was unconstitutionally drawn solely to send a minority group member to Congress.

The judges gave the Legislature until July 30 to come up with a redistricting plan for the 12th Congressional District, dubbed the "Bullwinkle District" because its shape resembles the cartoon moose.

The special panel concluded that race became the predominant factor in creating the district in New York City, represented since 1992 by Rep. Nydia Velazquez, a Democrat.

• FORMER COLLEGE PRESIDENT PLEADS GUILTY TO KILLING WIFE

ALLEGAN, Mich. — The former president of a Virginia college pleaded guilty to manslaughter today in the killing of his mentally ill wife, avoiding a murder trial that could have led to life in prison.

Under a plea bargain agreement, John Upton, 64, faces of a maximum of 15 years in prison.

Under the plea bargain, Upton was found to have been mentally ill when he bludgeoned, stabbed and suffocated Kathleen Upton, 63, last July at their stately summer home in Douglas along Lake Michigan.

• PERUVIAN REBEL SUGGESTS NOT ALL PRISONERS NEED BE RELEASED

LIMA, Peru — A Tupac Amaru official suggested Wednesday that rebels holding 72 men hostage would be flexible on their key demand — that the government release all their imprisoned comrades before the captives go free.

In a telephone interview from Hamburg, Germany, the Tupac Amaru rebels' spokesman in Europe said the rebels might be willing to free the hostages in exchange for the release of some rebel prisoners. They previously had demanded all be freed.

• BOY SAID HE WAS ASSAULTED AFTER SHARING HOTEL ROOM

BLOOMINGTON, Minn. — A 6-year-old boy told police a teen-ager sexually assaulted him when Northwest Airlines put them up in the same hotel room after they missed connecting flights during a blizzard.

The 14-year-old boy denied any wrongdoing, police said Wednesday.

The Hennepin County attorney's office is reviewing the case, but said it couldn't release details because of the age of the suspect.

Northwest spokesman Jon Austin said the airline declined comment.

The boys were flying alone and didn't know each other, Detective Ross Swanson said. They missed connecting flights during a blizzard Jan. 4 and were put up at a Hilton Hotel in this Minneapolis suburb, with a security guard outside.

KSTP-TV said nine children were stranded that night and were put into four rooms at the hotel. The detective could not confirm those numbers.

On the flight home the next day, the younger boy told fellow passengers he was assaulted. They told his mother, who called police, Swanson said.

The 6-year-old was flying from Tucson, Ariz., to Michigan. The older boy was flying from Seattle to South Dakota, police said.

The Department of Transportation said airlines set their own policies for accepting unaccompanied children on flights. Northwest accepts unaccompanied children 5 to 11 on same-plane or connecting flights.

• DEFENDANTS FOUND GUILTY IN 1988 DEATHS OF FIREFIGHTERS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — More than eight years after an explosion that killed six Kansas City firefighters, five people were convicted of setting the fire that led to the men's deaths.

A federal jury deliberated nearly two days before returning a unanimous guilty verdict, agreeing with prosecutors who said the defendants set the 1988 fire to cover their thefts from a construction site. Jurors return Thursday to begin the sentencing phase. Each defendant faces a maximum sentence of life in prison without parole and $250,000 in fines.

Spectators cried as the verdicts were read, capping a five-week trial. Several relatives of the firefighters approached U.S. Attorney Steve Hill and thanked him. Hill hugged them and said, "Well, you got your day."

Frank Sheppard, 46; his brother Skip Sheppard, 36; their nephew Bryan Sheppard, 25; Darlene Edwards, 42; and Richard Brown, 26, all of Kansas City, were convicted of one count each of using fire to destroy property in interstate commerce, resulting in deaths.

The firefighters were killed about 4 a.m. on Nov. 29, 1988, after arriving at a construction site fire along U.S. 71 in southern Kansas City. The victims were firefighters James Kilventon, Gerald Halloran, Robert McKarnin, Michael Oldham, Luther Hurd and Thomas Fry.

Museum staff reflects, craves students' input

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art has only been open six months, but the staff will tell you they've learned enough to fill a year.

Nelson Britt, museum director, said his staff is overworked and have been filling in at the museum seven days a week.

"I've got a staff that is exhausted," Britt said.

The staff is gearing up for Saturday's opening of the Georgia O'Keeffe "Canyon Suite" show.

Many of the activities that have kept the staff busy have been social functions for groups renting the museum's facilities.

Britt said the social schedule will slow down because he wants the museum to get away from being a place for receptions.

The Beach art museum drew some recent criticism from the Collegian's editorial board, which said the museum did not offer many inexpensive programming alternatives for students.

Although Britt said he takes issue with that viewpoint, he said the editorial helped the staff identify needs and areas of improvement.

"We really wanted the first six months to reflect things we can do," Britt said. "We can now evaluate those events. We questioned how we did our inaugural exhibits.

"One of the things that was successful was the Dean Mitchell gallery talk."

Britt said half of the nearly 70 people who attended the Mitchell talk were students.

"We count everyone who comes into the building. Consequently, a fair share are students," Britt said.

Britt said it is sometimes hard for the museum staff to stay focused because the museum serves so many contingencies, such as faculty, non-faculty, the community, alumni and donors, besides the main contingency of students.

"Museum directors, no matter what you do, will still be labeled by some as a leader of an elitist organization," Britt said. "We can let our hair down."

Upcoming events at the museum includes a segment of the Manhattan Center for the Arts BirdHouse concert series.

Students are also involved in many aspects of the museum, from docents to curatorial and management interns.

But students are not involved directly in the museum's planning processes.

The museum consists of several committees, such as one for acquisitions, one for education and one for publicity. No students serve on committees.

"There's not, but there should be," Britt said.

But Britt said most of the museum's events planned for the first year were coordinated more than two years ago, making the need for student involvement unnecessary at this point.

Britt said students could eventually be integrated into museum committees, but he wants students who are committed to the museum and will be active participants.

"I didn't want a student serving on a committee just for the sake of having a student, but to cultivate students who want to take a keen interest in us," he said. "We didn't want a revolving door."

For example, two student gallery attendants are now working as interns to the curator and the gallery manager.

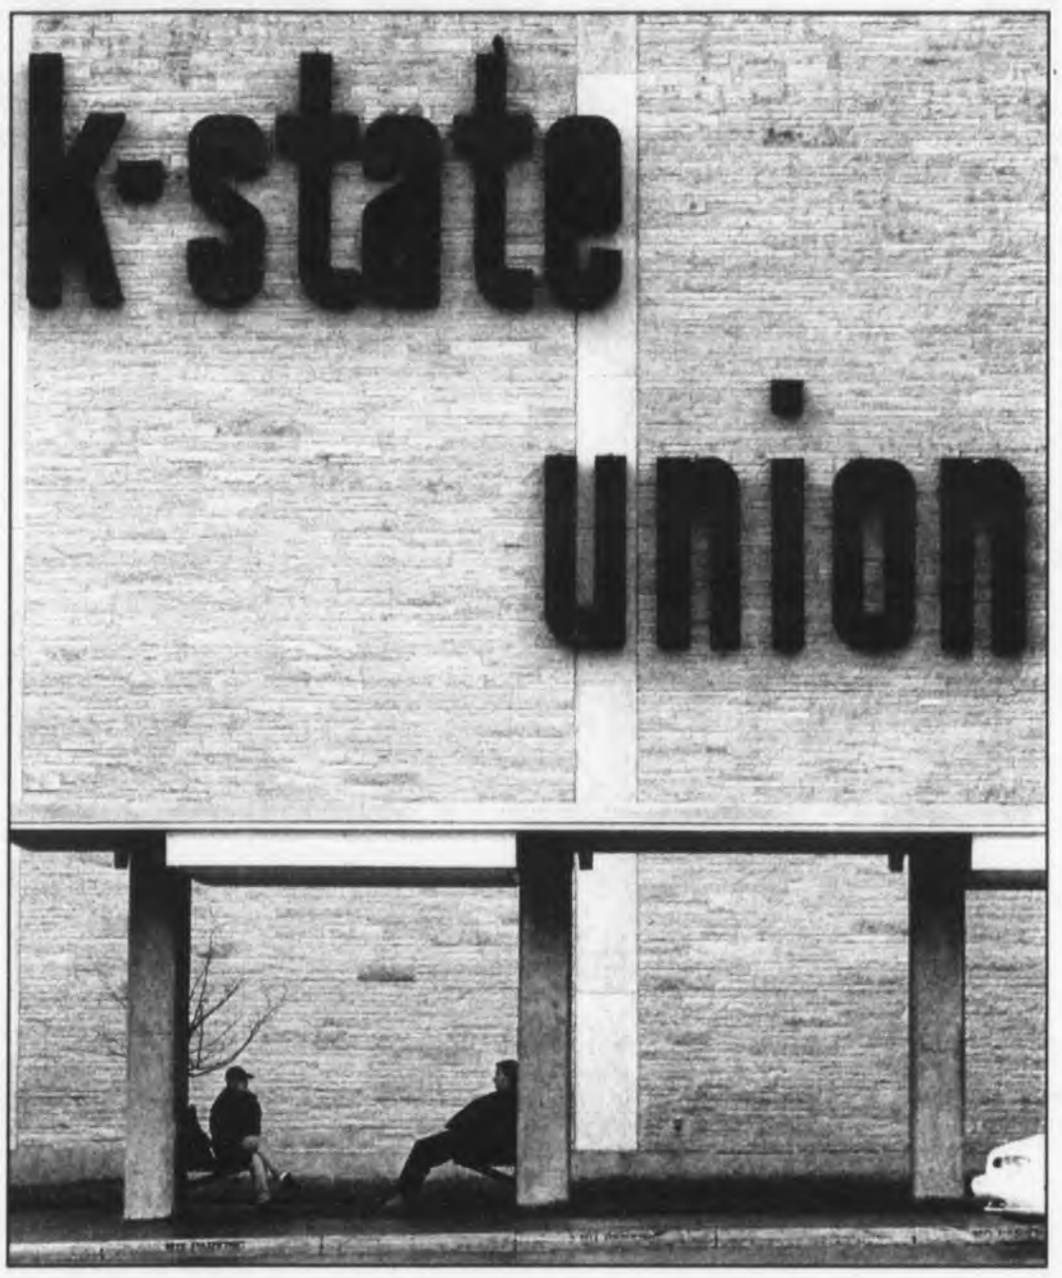
Britt said he also sees the Beach Bums, the art museum's student group, as an avenue for ideas.

"I'd be glad to address the student group and find out what students are thinking," he said. "Some of the best exhibitions of my career have come from second-hand conversations.

"Why can't that happen with particular events at this museum?"

Another point the museum staff is addressing is staying open Thursday nights, a traditional evening for extended museum hours.

Britt said the art museum could have evening hours as soon as this spring or fall at the latest.



Of course, museum programming always depends on the bottom line: funding.

Britt said the $1-million museum endowment, part of the $3-million gift to the museum for Ross and Marianna Beach, amounts to about $70,000 per year for programming such as lectures and symposia, education, insurance and exhibitions.

He said that because the gift was given a few years ago and had time to accrue interest, the museum had a larger-than-usual budget for its inaugural year.

But Britt said the staff is looking at ways to keep costs down for fiscal year 1998.

The O'Keeffe exhibition, costing $30,000 to mount — expensive in the art world — is underwritten by Crosby Kemper of Kansas City, who owns a majority of the work.

Pilots Program helps students with low ACT scores

HANG NGUYEN
staff reporter

There are students considered at risk at K-State.

At risk is what the University labels students in the Pilots Program.

Pilots is a 3-year-old program dedicated to helping students who enter K-State with a score of 18 or less on their American Collegiate Testing Program or whose adviser has recommended Pilots to them, said Mike Lynch, assistant vice president for institutional advancement.

"I don't even entertain the term at risk in regards to the program," Anita Cortez, coordinator of the Pilots Program, said. "This is for students in their freshman year who do need the extra support, who do need some extra attention to get off to a good start."

Pilots came about because K-State was concerned about student retention rates, Cortez said.

The highest risk goes to students in their freshman year because of issues of adaptation to campus life and independent living.

In fall 1996, there were 108 Pilots students. This semester, there are 100 students remaining in the program.

"The main purpose is to challenge them with the same classes, the same curriculum as a non-Pilots student but be there to help them out and encourage them," Cortez said.

Pilots students are required to take 12-15 hours per semester. They have a core curriculum consisting of a social science class, a math course, a required communications course and one called Enhanced University Experience.

The Pilots Program is funded through the tuition of those who sign up for the program when they enroll.

The tuition of Pilots students is the same as non-Pilots. The tuition then goes to pay its staff of instructors, graduate teaching assistants, and tutors, Lynch said.

Experienced GTAs and instructors from different departments on campus teach the small classes, Cortez said.

She said Pilots ensures that the expectations of the departments are met for the sake of making sure that Pilots students get everything a non-Pilots does plus a little bit more.

The program helps, said John Jones, reading development lab instructor. It depends on what the students take out of it.

He said the program tries hard to demystify professors and instructors.

"(Teachers) don't treat you any different," Stefanie French, a freshman in psychology, said. "They're really good teachers. Their teaching ability isn't any different than the non-Pilots professors."

The Pilots team also consists of tutors for speech, math, writing, sociology, psychology, history and geography.

"Pilots has connected me to a lot of people like administrators who I've never had a chance to meet. It's really boosted my self-confidence," said Shawna Dulan, former Pilots student and currently a Pilots speech tutor.

The at-risk students have shown they can achieve, Cortez said.

Fifty-one students received a 3.O grade point average with 12 or more hours and 20 students made a 3.5 GPA or higher.

"I'm glad I was put here," French said. "Pilots have made me feel comfortable to a new surrounding."

Handicap parking spaces not loading/unloading zones

Do a good deed. Walk a mile in another person's shoes. That's all well and good, but what if the other person literally cannot walk a mile?

Parking Services issue handicap parking permits not only to those who are permanently, physically handicapped but also to those whose health problems render them unable to walk long distances. This includes those faculty members or students who have a broken leg or a strength-sapping illness, such as cancer.

People with handicap permits have a legal right to the spaces set aside for them. Able-bodied students should not take up those spaces, even if it is just for a few minutes.

Be considerate. Don't pull into those handicap spaces in front of Eisenhower Hall or the K-State Student Union while waiting to pick up friends or significant others after class. Turning on your hazard lights does not help the person who has a legitimate need for the space you are taking.

There is a $100 fine for those who are caught illegally parked in handicap spaces. Maybe Parking Services should consider monitoring those spaces more closely, especially during high-traffic times.

Those who drive to campus deal daily with the stress of trying to find a parking space in time to high-tail it to class. Imagine the frustration of having to fight for a space reserved specifically for you.

Show a little sensitivity. Try on your neighbor's Nikes.

Helpful hints might prevent minor skirmishes, MAJOR WARS

War.

Many historians attribute the origins of war to geographical boundaries, religious beliefs, language barriers or cultural clashes.

I don't think so.

My theory is that the root of war lies in the heart of poor driving. Think about it.

It's more believable that a war started by being cut-off at an intersection, not using a turn signal, driving too slow or stealing a parking spot.

There is something about sitting behind the steering wheel that just gives you an extraordinary sense of power. There are few acts that can provide more of a rush than clipping along at 70-some mph.

The problem with this power, like many things, is that it can be misused. But the truth is, this problem is easily solved.

If manufacturers could begin reconstructing vehicles, drivers could take this problem solving into their own hands. There is nothing more annoying than a left-lane hugger. You know what I am talking about. Left-lane huggers are those drivers who refuse to drive in the right-hand lane, no matter what speed they are going. (And more times than not, they are going five to 10 miles slower than the speed limit.)

These people must be stopped.

To stop them, we must start equipping vehicles with exterior BB guns. They would be designed so that the driver could aim and fire the gun from the inside of the car while driving.

The pellets would then splatter against the car violating the basic rules of driving. No physical harm would be done by these innocent little reminders. These pellets would simply be friendly little ways of saying, "Hey, you are an idiot. Move it or lose it."

This would also be an effective method for speeding up that Sunday driver we all get behind when we are in a hurry. I always seem to get behind folks who drive slower than the Earth seems to be rotating on its axis.

The pellet method would also be quite useful when you are sitting behind a driver who does not realize that the light turned green five minutes ago.

In this situation, I would be saying to myself, "How green do you want it to be?" But with my driver-side BB gun, I would take matters into my own hands while aiding my fellow drivers.

See how easy it is.

There is no need to load up the troops or drop bombs. We just need to give each other friendly reminders on the road.

But our problems are not completely solved with the war-preventing BB gun.

In the age of crime and crappy drivers, there is a growing need to be suspicious of those people we share the road with. It's hard to know who you can trust these days.

Don't fret. Your problems are solved. I have developed a theory about the correlation between the level of trust a person should be allotted and their license plate.

I've been working on this for a while and plan to do my thesis on this very hypothesis, but I still have to find a committee that will sign for it.

Through extensive research, I have discovered that dependable individuals are easily identifiable on the road. Like some sort of cult, civically minded people flaunt a purple and silver front license plate.

I'm sure you have seen these mysterious Powercat plates and maybe you are even a member of this elite group. My advice to you is not to fear these people. They are our friends.

On the flip side, my research discovered a group of shady characters who occupy our highways. They are those suspect individuals who have white plates with a comical bird that reads — Jayhawks. As a resident of this community, it is my duty to warn my fellow Americans against these lowlifes. Protect your children. Seek shelter. Move away slowly.

I hope this information will assist you on the roadways and prevent future wars.

Happy trails.

Giddy up!

Education and vigilance vital to GREEK LIFE

VIEWPOINT

JUSTIN WILD

JUSTIN WILD is a senior in English and education. You can e-mail your comments to Justin at (justone@ksu.edu).

I believe in balance. Without it, everything can go straight to hell.

Take intellect, for example: when people study too much, or spend all their time with books, they run the danger of becoming introverted and having difficulty socializing. On the other hand, if people become too much of a socialite, other areas of their lives, such as grades, suffer.

K-State's greek system has turned its focus so heavily toward the social arena that what was once a strong system is in jeopardy of falling far below its potential.

If this were untrue, then why do we, as greeks, have so many rules governing our parties?

If this were untrue, then why did greeks appear in the Collegian last semester, twice regarding negative circumstances that involved alcohol?

Before I go on, I want to point out that there are plenty of greeks whose focus does not rest with the party, but in other aspects of student life. The greek system fosters leaders, offers a good living environment, and gives an individual a chance to be a part of something that is both bigger and better than they are.

But with those good people, a few bad ones have cropped up as well. Alcohol is an increasingly prevalent trend in greek life, and it is also the bane of the system. Alcohol, and a lack of education about what can happen when it is abused, is an Achilles' heel the size of many houses' social calendar.

In essence, there are four areas of greek life that should form a balance with one another: fraternal, intellectual, social and spiritual.

Fraternal refers to the obvious, that being brotherhood and a mutual respect individuals hold for one another.

Intellect is what we're all at K-State to foster, and the spiritual side of the equation refers to the relationship one holds with whatever higher power they choose.

A social life does have a place in our lives. We can broaden our horizons by meeting others and by having a good time.

However, excess within the social realm causes more damage than the other sides of the square do. You will never read about a house, portrayed in a negative light, that is too smart or too spiritual.

You will, though, read a story dealing with what went wrong at a fraternity party, as well as the result of such excess. The house involved almost doesn't matter, because the majority of readers are only going to see the word fraternity, and not the name of the house within the article.

I have heard the argument that, in short, says greeks are students, the same as everyone else at K-State. Therefore, when greeks get in trouble, it shouldn't be looked at as a big deal. After all, don't independent students make headlines as well?

I disagree with this line of thought for one reason: each house has a set of morals in its constitution, or a code, to live by. If individuals can take an oath at their initiation ceremony to live by that code, then they should be adult enough to stand by their word.

I have also heard an argument that dictates that greek issues such as alcohol abuse should not be brought to light because it will give greeks bad press.

I would rather discuss a problem, in a forum such as this one, than read about another mistake on the front page of the paper.

Not talking about a problem doesn't solve anything.

America is entering a time of change. Our demographics are changing, and to stay afloat we must evolve alongside change. No one is excluded from this.

In the end, if we, as greeks, educate ourselves about our problems in order to remedy them, we will all become not only well-rounded individuals, but our system will become a well-rounded square as well.

• STUDENT SUGGESTS USING SUPPORTING FACTS.

Dear Editor,

Once again someone tries to state facts using nothing but misconceptions, hot air and the Bible.

Robbie Nutter stated in a letter to the editor on Wednesday that the use of a condom was useless in the prevention of AIDS.

To back this up, he used a lot of unsupported nonsense, and ended his argument basically stating that the only effective prevention against the contraction of AIDS is marriage.

First of all, it has been stated for quite some time now that the proper use of a latex condom can reduce the risk of contracting most forms of sexually transmitted diseases including AIDS.

This has been stated by the American Medical Association and disease control centers around the country for years now.

If you want some actual documented proof on this subject, I suggest you go to Lafene or the library and look it up.

Somehow I doubt that you will find any reference to condoms or AIDS hidden in the Bible.

As for marriage being an effective barrier for the contraction of AIDS, I must ask if there is some magical barrier or immunity that comes into place during the wedding ceremony?

With the high rate of divorce and infidelity I sure hope so.

Not to mention the fact that the federal government has, with the passing of the Defense of Marriage Act last fall, effectively made it legal for states to not recognize marriage as a right for around ten percent of the population, but that is a whole different topic.

Can the use of condoms absolutely prevent the spread of AIDS?

No, of course not. There are no absolutes in this world, but they can greatly reduce the risk.

Is it my opinion that sex should only be between two individuals that love each other (regardless of their respective genders)?

Yes it is.

Does love only exist within the bounds of marriage?

Obviously not.

• READER URGES PROPER USE OF HANDICAP SPACES.

Dear Editor,

I am extremely concerned with the attitude many people in this town and University have shown towards the handicap-parking spaces, which are all over the city and in the University.

Many times I have tried to park my car in those reserved places at K-State and have found myself in a bad situation.

Students have been parking there without a sticker or a handicap plate, taking the space from people like me who are partially or completely disabled.

I have a disabled license plate. That is an action that I do not feel comfortable with.

For example, on Friday, February 21, I had an appointment at Lafene Student Health Center.

Of course, I was trying to find a parking space close to the building, because I am walking with the aid of a walker and have a cast on my leg as a result of a recent bone graft. I was furious to see a student parked in the handicap place without any visible plate or sticker.

This is what I am fighting in this campus.

People need to understand that one minute or even five seconds can be crucial for people like me who need the space, but someone else has taken it because he or she feels that no one will notice or even bother to care...I DO.

The next time you park in a handicap place, please, think twice. That minute or those seconds can be so important to a disabled person.

Think of the distance, which is a crucial factor for someone who has a disability.

Misusing this space forces disabled people to walk more.

Maybe you never had to walk with crutches, or even have faced bone cancer like I have, but that has not stopped me from making people aware of our needs and rights.

Put yourself in my situation.

You have a broken leg, have a cast, walk with crutches and need a parking space closer to the building where you take your classes, or closer to the store, or even closer to the movie theater.

You find yourself without a parking space because someone else has parked in a place that has been reserved for you because of your temporary disability.

What if the disability becomes permanent? Just think.

I hope that this letter will raise some awareness in this community about the need for people to respect handicap places and leave them to those who really need them.

▶ MELVIN VS. THE WORLD

It's the end of the month, bills are due and you're hungry.

Payday looms a few days away.

The temptation exists to write hot checks.

Should you do it?

CHECKS GONE BAD

STORY BY RACHAEL KRUEGER

His stomach turned as he examined his bank statement.

Not only did his checks bounce, but overdraft fees were charged to his account. The cause was an unfortunate error in his calculations.

"It's a really expensive way to borrow money," said Jack Thoman, assistant director of business affairs at K-State.

Throughout his 25 years at K-State, he said he has seen this type of situation frequently through the check-cashing service at the K-State Student Union.

"I've been told every story there is," he said.

Bouncing checks is considered check fraud by the law. Other forms of the offense include forged signatures, forged endorsements, counterfeit checks and altered checks.

Forgeries are rare at K-State, Thoman said. In one instance, a right-handed student altered his signature by signing his checks with his left hand.

The student blamed an imaginary criminal for the checks that he wrote, until his roommate turned him in.

Of approximately 100,000 checks that go through the Union annually, less than 1 percent go uncollected.

Thoman said he sympathizes with students who bounce checks on account of miscalculations.

"It gets expensive when you bounce a 47 cent check at the Copy Center," he said.

Outside the University, numbers grow in severity.

The Riley County Attorney's Office reported almost $95,000 in worthless checks in 1996.

Pat Dembkowski is a customer service officer at Commerce Bank.

"People of all ages do it," he said. "There isn't one specific group."

Check fraud and counterfeiting account nationally for an annual loss of approximately $10 billion, according to the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland. The Federal Reserve stated this is one of the fastest-growing problems facing the nation's financial system.

Both Thoman and Dembkowski said that they haven't seen a significant increase in check fraud in Manhattan over the past years.

"It's the businesses that hurt," Dembkowski said.

Scams involving bad checks are among the most common crimes against businesses, according to the Better Business Bureau.

If overdrafts become habitual, action would be taken then, Dembkowski said.

The Union requires a photo ID to cash a check, a precaution many businesses use.

Taco Bell avoids this problem by banning the use of checks.

"College students tend to write a lot of hot checks," Pat Holman, shift manager at Taco Bell, said.

When a worthless check is less than $500, the law calls it a Class A non-person misdemeanor.

This offense is punishable by a fine and/or confinement in jail.

Both Commerce Bank and Sunflower Bank provide various types of overdraft protection. This prevents writers of bounced checks from undergoing punishment.

The average worthless check amount was $59.43 in 1996, according to a report from the County Attorney's Office. The smallest worthless check amount was $1.49 and the largest was $6,000.

Students may also find themselves the recipients of fraudulent checks.

In cases of doubt, the Federal Reserve stated the best way to confirm the worth of the check is by making a call to the bank on which the check was drawn.

Film's bright moments sometimes lack luster

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Movie Review

The film "Shine" is frustrating and remarkable.

This intense character study charts the inspiring rise, fall and comeback of Australian piano prodigy David Helfgott (Geoffrey Rush).

"Shine" begins with a mad adult Helfgott rambling around in a rain shower, lost and confused, before cutting away to scenes of his childhood. In this way, director Scott Hicks has filled your mind with questions that will be, and are, hopefully answered over the course of the film.

We find the young Helfgott (Alex Rafalowicz) reaching for success in talent competitions and eventually working his way to prominence as a teen-age piano genius (Noah Taylor).

And yet, Helfgott's new life is sadly divided. He finds encouragement from an intelligent writer friend, sweetly played by Googie Withers, and from his piano instructor, a man whom David's father never fully trusts.

It's sad because Helfgott is not only born with a natural passion and skill for the piano, but, crucially, his talent is also wrought by his difficult relationship with his father. Peter Helfgott (Armin Mueller-Stahl), is a divided man — both madly affectionate of his son and brutally critical of his developing talent.

When his criticisms develop into verbal rage and physical abuse, David slowly removes himself from his tightly-woven family and finds solace in the only thing he knows, his piano.

Eventually, David is driven away to the Royal Academy of Music in London where he is tutored by Cecil Parkes (John Gielgud) and where he fulfills his father's wish of him to learn the burdensome Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3. His recital performance of the piece pushes the fragile boy over the physical and mental edge, which leads him home to Australia.

It is in Australia where David goes slightly mad, only to recoup his facilities with the generosity and love of a friend, Gillian (Lynn Redgrave).

Perhaps the film's subject isn't too unconventional, but director Hicks has crafted a stylish piece with subtle artiness.

Witness the warm light that bathes the wooden home of Withers, while a cold blue quality envelops the corrugated metal siding of the Helfgott home. Other scenes are much more surreal, such as an adult David swimming in a pool with sheet music, which add to an overall eccentricity to the film.

This film illustrates the poor standards of Hollywood film-making. Hicks dares to dwell on his characters, focusing on their facial nuances and unassuming performances. With a typical American cast, this would be pointless (witness "In Love and War").

The metaphorical evolution of David's eyeglasses in the film is enough to satisfy the pickiest critic.

Rush is brilliant, if a bit underused, since the film explores David's childhood as equally as his struggles as an adult. However, his mumbling, internally-focused performance, comparisons to Dustin Hoffman's "Rain Man" notwithstanding, no doubt had some influence in Rush's Academy Award nomination for Best Actor.

Gielgud and Redgrave lend their respectability to the film, with Redgrave garnering admiration with her offbeat approach. She's one of two reasons, Rush being the other, the last 20 minutes of the film are so tender.

As with any film concerning musicians, a lovely mix of classical pieces (some played by Helfgott) and original score by David Hirschfelder make "Shine" sound as splendid as it looks.

Although "Shine" has garnered seven Oscar nominations including Best Picture, it's daring on the part of Westloop Theaters to bring an art film to a community that would much rather see the tiresomely conventional "Fools Rush In" (which sold out Friday at the same theater).

It's hard to understand what any person couldn't find in a film tackling such compelling issues in such a sensitive and stylish manner.

Cats sign 4 fresh volleyball recruits for coming year

BRIAN SMOLLER
staff reporter

The K-State football team is not the sole source of impressive recruits. K-State's volleyball team will see its roster grow by three next year.

Heather Heff and Kelle Branting both signed letters of intent to play for the Wildcats. Native Kansan Julie Thomas is also planning to attend K-State and play for the team.

Heff is from North Allegheny High School in Pittsburgh, Pa. Head volleyball coach Jim Moore said Heff has a good chance of being a starter next season.

"She's had the most training of all of them," Moore said. "I have a hard time believing her not making an impact."

Heff plays middle blocker and, coupled with the loss of senior middle blocker Kate DeClerk, Moore said that is just what the Cats needed.

"She's a true middle, and we need that," he said.

Branting is from North Platte High School in North Platte, Neb. Branting turned down a chance to play for Nebraska's basketball team to sign with the Cats. Moore said Branting's long-range ability will benefit the Cats the most.

"She's an outstanding athlete who has a chance to be an outstanding player in the long run," Moore said.

Thomas, like Branting, is labeled by Moore as an outstanding athlete. Thomas is out of Bishop Meige High School in Overland Park. Moore said her lack of experience will not detract from her stepping in and having an effect.

"We're not real sure where we're going to put her," Moore said, "but she is really quick and fast."

The Wildcats are coming off a 26-9 record and a 24th national ranking from last season. Despite the loss of three seniors off the squad, Moore is looking for a better 1997.

"We just want to improve on where we've been," he said.

Kentucky star announces intent to play in NBA

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LEXINGTON, Ky. — Intent on removing all distractions as Kentucky pursues a second straight NCAA title, Ron Mercer is giving up his last two years of eligibility to enter the NBA draft.

The 6'7" sophomore forward, the leading scorer in the Southeastern Conference, is expected to be one of the top selections in the June draft.

"I have a team to take care of, and I want that to be my main focus," Mercer said Wednesday in making his widely anticipated announcement. "That's why I'm doing this now so I can put it behind me and focus on winning another championship."

Kentucky coach Rick Pitino said Mercer was swayed by the NBA's high regard for him.

"If the NBA thinks he's top three in the draft, then he's ready," Pitino said. "They like the fact that he flies through the air with the greatest of ease."

Pitino likened Mercer's game to that of Detroit Pistons star Grant Hill.

"He's an extraordinary player and person," Pitino said of Mercer. "They (NBA teams) don't always get players like that."

Mercer, a finalist for player of the year awards, is averaging 18.1 points and 5.3 rebounds a game.

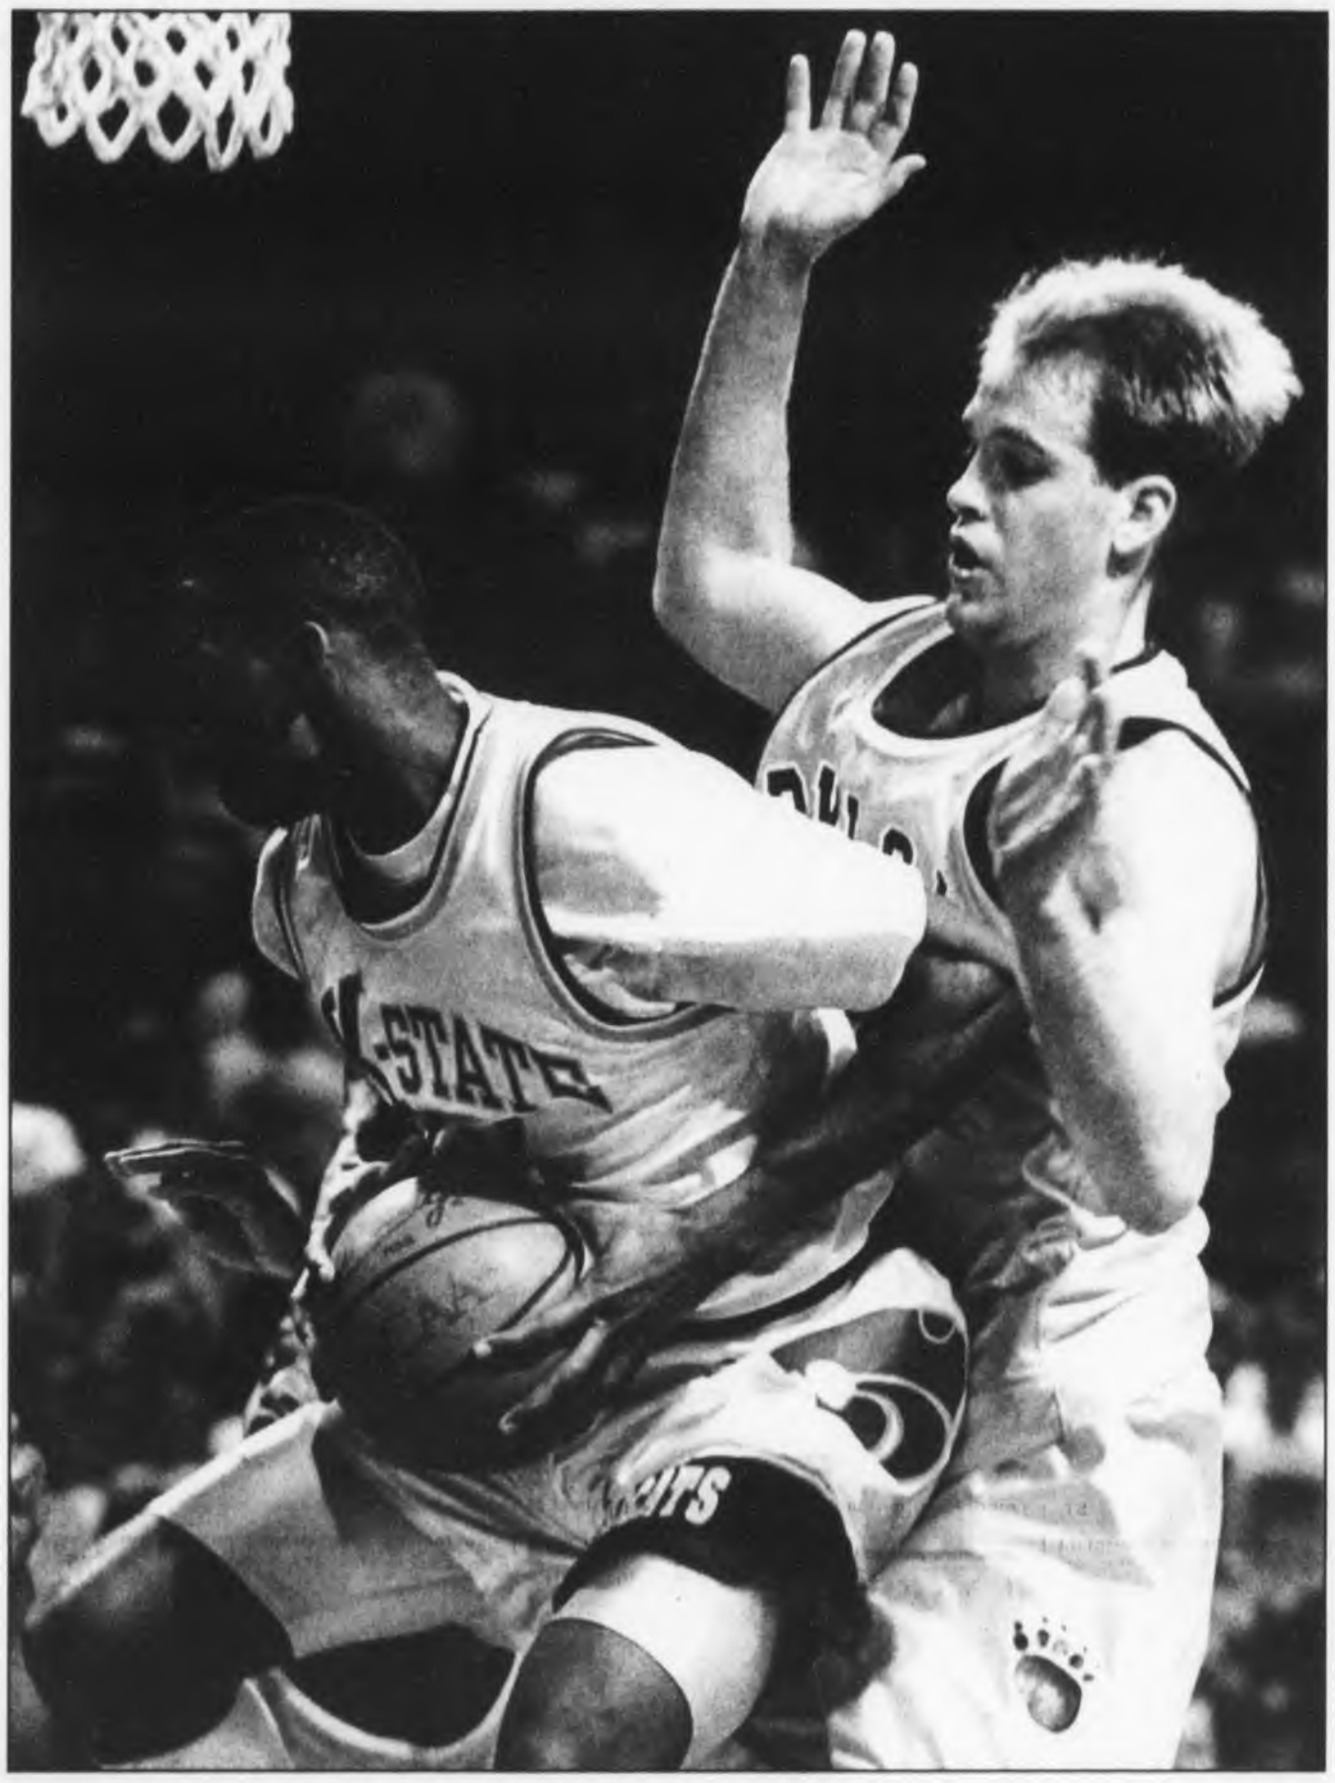
"Certainly Ron Mercer has been someone special for us the past two years," Pitino said. "He helped us win a championship last year. He's been a humble, hard-working player since the day I met him."

Mercer is the third player under Pitino to turn pro before completing his eligibility, joining Jamal Mashburn in 1993 and Antoine Walker in 1996.

"He's as good as Mashburn and Antoine," Pitino said. "Who's going to be the best? The NBA will find out. Not me. I'll never find out."

Mercer, of Nashville, Tenn., recently took out an insurance policy that would pay him $500,000 in case of a career-ending injury this season.

Mercer's teammate, Derek Anderson, sustained a season-ending knee injury Jan. 18, and that influenced his decision.



"I looked into it after he went down and knew it could happen to anybody," Mercer said. "I took it from here."

He said he and his parents met with Pitino Friday to discuss his options.

He said his mother, Birdie, wanted him to get his education.

"She told me to take some time out and think about it," Mercer said.

Everything was all but smooth for the K-State men's basketball team in the 75-58 defeat Baylor dealt the Cats.

K-State has been out-rebounded, out-hustled and out-scrapped, but still has played with some of the better teams in the conference.

No doubt the Cats were trying to build some momentum for the Big 12 Tournament, but Wednesday night in Bramlage Coliseum the Baylor Bears rained down on K-State, showing the second worst road team in the conference can win on the road.

"We got into a panic mode I guess," guard Mark Young said. "And then — I don't know, I just don't know."

Regarding the loss, K-State coach Tom Asbury chose to offer his sentiments to the crowd of supporters who came to watch the Cats.

"We did nothing — offensively, defensively," Asbury said. "We played like a junior-high team tonight, and I don't know how to explain it. And I'm not even going to try."

Even so, down 60-53 with just 8:31 left in the second half, the Cats found themselves sitting to make a final plunge at the Bears.

But Baylor had other ideas.

From that point on, the Bears scored nine straight points and kept K-State to just two field goals in the last 8-1/2 minutes, leaving the Wildcat faithful and Young still searching for some answers.

"To be honest with you, I don't know," Young said. "We got on them early, but they just took care of the game."

Asbury said K-State couldn't find any rhythm in the final minutes and was just taking bad shots.

"The wrong guys taking the wrong shots, and then we'll go down and make a hustle play and lose the ball," Asbury said. "It's one of those Murphy's Law kind of nights."

Give credit to K-State, which jumped out on the Bears early, hoping to make that final lunge out of the conference cellar.

Forward Manny Dies chipped in K-State's first four points and helped the Cats exercise an 11-2 lead with 15:18 left in the first half.

Hellacious defense kept K-State in the game early, forcing 12 turnovers on the Bears. The Cats shut down the post-play and managed to keep the ball away from center Brian Skinner.

But, usually when you concentrate on the post-players somebody else is wide open, right?

"Yeah, we were worried too much about the post-players coming in," Dies said. "We stopped them, but that left the perimeter players open to do their thing."

And that's exactly what they did.

Holding a 15-9 lead with 12:37 left, the Cats seemingly lost their sizzle. Baylor went on a 15-1 run over the next three minutes, including 12 straight by guard Roddrick Miller, who finished with 15 points.

In that span, Baylor hit four straight three-pointers and took a 24-16 lead with 9:25 left.

"The difference was the three-point shot. We just didn't defend it," Asbury said.

K-State cut its lead to just three, 24-21, when Aaron Swartzendruber made a three-pointer with 8:57 left. But the Cats never got closer than that mark in the first half, and Baylor exercised a 41-29 halftime lead.

Skinner paced the Bears with 16 points and eight rebounds, moving the Bears to 18-10 on the year.

Dies and Young both finished the game with 12 points and 10 rebounds, just the third time this year two players recorded double-doubles in the same game. It was Dies' second double-double in just his third game back from a foot injury.

Baylor rains down on Cats from 3-point line, 7 different Bears hit from beyond arc

sports writer

Sometimes you live by the three and sometimes you die by the three.

Wednesday night, Baylor definitely lived by the three, connecting on 11 of them in a 75-58 win over K-State.

It may have been snowing outside Bramlage Coliseum, but it was raining three-pointers on the Bears' side during the first half.

"It just started raining three-pointers, I needed a hood to keep shelter from them," senior center Gerald Eaker said. "They just kept hitting them in the first half. I don't know how many they exactly hit."

The Bears connected on eight three-point attempts out of 11 tries in the first half.

Their first connection beyond the arc didn't come until the 12:16 mark when Roddrick Miller brought the Bears to within two, 14-12.

After that basket, Miller lead the Bears to their next nine points, hitting three free throws and two more three-pointers.

"It sure is a lot of fun when you are making them," Miller said. "I don't know how to explain it. I just got in the zone. I just got hot."

After Miller's last trey at the 10:01 mark, the Bears scored 15 of their final 20 first half points from the three-point line. In that span, five different Bear players connected on the trey shot.

The spurt led to a 41-29 halftime lead for the Bears.

"Its obvious that we didn't defend the three very well tonight," Cat coach Tom Asbury said.

"We told the players they have taken 600 three-pointers. We knew they could hit them. We just lost them. Nobody was out there to guard them," he said.

Coming into the game, the Cats knew they would have to focus on Bear center Brian Skinner.

Skinner came into the contest averaging 16.2 points a game. By the end of the first half, the Cats had held Skinner to just five points.

While the Cat defense shut down the postgame of the Bears, it opened the flood gates from the perimeter.

"If you try to double down us inside, we can hurt teams from the outside," Skinner said. "We proved that tonight. They tried to collapse down low on me. That just opened up our perimeter game."

Although the Bears only connected on three of the long balls in the second half, they were shots that kept the Cats distant.

After drawing to within nine points, Patrick Hunter drilled a three that stretched the Bear lead to 46-34. David Jones' three-pointer gave the Bears a 10-point lead at the 13:25 mark. Jones' next trey boosted the Bear lead to 12 at the 9:23 mark.

For the game, seven different Bears hit three-point baskets.

"We just have a lot of great shooters from the top of our roster to the bottom," Miller said. "Everybody was just getting great looks tonight."

Native Americans explain tradition of rug weaving to elementary-school children at Manhattan Center for the Arts as an example of

Navajo culture said never weave a rug when it is raining or lightning for fear of bad luck.

Alice George defied the ancient spirits Tuesday when she demonstrated the art of weaving to wide-eyed elementary-school children and a seated audience at the Manhattan Center for the Arts.

Art Review

George, a member of the Navajo Indian Reservation in the northeastern part of New Mexico, has enlightened gatherings for more than eight years with her native culture.

This is done by allowing people throughout the United States to enter a world filled with Native American song, large-print designs and a culture most people only experience in history books.

Dressed in a double blanket with a sash belt, George and her assistant for the evening, Frances Vitali, a graduate intern at Farrell Library, disclosed the signature of Navajo tradition. A single extending colored wool strand called the "weaver's pathway," running from the center to the edge of each rug allows the weaver to escape and maintain creativity.

George and Vitali introduced themselves with a drum and flute, and performed a Navajo welcome song, a Native American melody, which captures the essence of Navajo beauty.

"It tells how beautiful the Navajo nation and the land is and says that we are all of one clan, and we all have one belief," George said. "We walk in beauty."

George, an assistant special education teacher at Lake Valley Navajo School, shares many other roles as a weaver, singer, educator, mother and grandmother. She practices Navajo culture on her reservation, but said she enjoys incorporating western culture while on her trips.

The art of weaving is a long-lived Navajo tradition complete with its own legend about its origins. At 9 years old, George was introduced to the art by her mother, who instilled in her the pathology of the Spiderwoman, who originated the first Navajo blankets.

As George passed by each hanging blanket and rug, she told of the different history surrounding each pattern. The storm pattern consists of a zig-zag design that, in shades of red, black and gray, traces the storm and signifies rough weather.

Members of the audience shared their Native American rugs and blankets with George and Vitali, who described the delicate material's designs and its meaning.

A pupil of Navajo culture under George's guidance, Vitali said she has enjoyed learning the tradition of Navajo weavings.

"I first met Alice while I was a teacher for five years at Lake Valley," Vitali said. "Alice does it all."

"I'm going to go out to dinner, but I guess that's about all I can do," she said. "I'm going to party somehow."

Babyface, who earned a record-tying 12 Grammy nominations, won the songwriter's award for best rhythm and blues composition, "Exhale (Shoop Shoop)," sung by Whitney Houston. He also was honored as producer of the year.

Beck augured a changing of the guard for rock music, beating out veterans Bruce Springsteen, Bryan Adams, Clapton and John Hiatt for an award for his surrealistic "Where It's At." He also won for best alternative music performance.

Braxton, admitting she was surprised to beat Celine Dion, won best female pop performance and best female rhythm and blues performance for two different songs: "Un-break My Heart" and "You're Makin' Me High."

Crow won for best rock album and best female rock performance for "If It Makes You Happy."

The Fugees, who performed with late reggae star Bob Marley's back-up band, took home two awards. Gill won for best country collaboration and best male country vocal performance.

Tracy Chapman received a Grammy for best rock song for her plea to a reluctant lover, "Give Me One Reason." The song was also nominated for record and song of the year.

Opponents of capital punishment said the state could save up to $1.5 million a year by abolishing it. They also said minority defendants are more likely to be sentenced to death than white defendants and that in the past, innocent people have been executed.

Supporters of the death penalty said it represents a just punishment for the most heinous crimes and noted a majority of voters support it.

They also said that since the law took effect, five high-profile murder cases have been resolved before going to trial when defendants facing capital murder charges pleaded guilty, accepting a hard-40 sentence.

The applications require basic information such as name, address and social security numbers. Information from students' parents is also necessary.

"Income tax information from parents 1996 tax returns is required. Students also need income tax information from their own tax forms," Moeder said.

Efforts of the firefighters were hampered because their 100-foot aerial ladder truck was in for repairs. The aerial truck was needed to reach over power lines, McSwain said.

Lawrence has a reciprocal aid agreement with Overland Park, but the Overland Park 100-foot aerial was also being repaired, McSwain said. Overland Park sent a 75-foot aerial, and Olathe was sending its 100-foot aerial, he said.

"It's just difficult when you are doing a defensive fire on an old building," McSwain said of the efforts to keep the fire from spreading before firefighters tried to put it out.

AIDS deaths, growth rate decline

▶ Look it up on the World Wide Web. The NAMES Project maintains a highly interactive Web site with information about the AIDS Quilt and general information. (http://www.aidsquilt.org/).

▶ TREATMENT PROGRAMS credited for decline in AIDS deaths in 1996.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — AIDS deaths fell 13 percent in the first half of 1996, the first significant drop since the epidemic began in 1981, the government said Thursday. Officials credited better treatment and programs.

"This is one of the first bright spots we have seen in this epidemic," said Christopher Portelli, executive director of the National Lesbian and Gay Health Association in Washington. "But we hope it is seen as a call to arms rather than a chance to relax and breathe a sigh of relief."

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention said about 22,000 people died of AIDS in the first six months of 1996, down from the 24,900 deaths in the same period a year earlier.

The CDC saw a slight drop in AIDS deaths in the second quarter of 1995, but researchers did not see it as significant.

There was more good news Thursday: While the number of people diagnosed with AIDS continues to grow, the growth rate is slowing. In 1995, about 62,200 people were diagnosed, an increase of less than 2 percent over the 61,200 new cases in 1994. The growth rate from 1993 to 1994 was 5 percent.

The first signs of the drop in AIDS deaths came in January, when New York City reported a 30-percent drop in AIDS deaths in 1996.

"I think this speaks to the success of the dual approach of counseling, testing and treating people with HIV," said Patricia Fleming, the CDC's chief of HIV/AIDS reporting and analysis.

The CDC credits better treatment for AIDS patients, including new drugs, and better access to treatment through state and federal programs.

What's still unclear is the effect of a new class of drugs called protease inhibitors. The AIDS death rate leveled off in 1995, before those medicines became widely available.

Not all doctors are sure that AIDS is making an about-face, however.

"In my view, this decline is unfor-

Genetic mutation fails to prevent AIDS virus

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — When scientists announced last year that a particular genetic mutation can make some people resist the AIDS virus, they cautioned that the protection isn't perfect.

Now they have proof.

Researchers in Australia say they've found a man who got infected despite having the mutation.

The infection was diagnosed in 1992, and the man has yet to show AIDS symptoms, the researchers report in the March issue of the journal Nature Medicine.

Previously, nearly 3,000 infected people had been screened for the mutation, and none of them had it.

The mutation is an alteration in both copies of a particular gene. This double dose alters a chemical foothold needed by HIV strains that are

THIS SPRING BREAK, 15 STUDENTS WILL GO TO CALIFORNIA

Spring break usually finds students traveling to the beach, the slopes or the bars. But for 15 students, spring break will come a week early and allow them to showcase their talents.

On March 21, the K-State junior varsity cheerleading squad will compete in Anaheim, Calif., at the third annual USA Collegiate Nationals competition for the first time as a squad.

"This is a national competition that will give our squad some experience for next year," Steve Kirkland, K-State's cheerleading coach, said. "We are not sure of the competition yet, but I think we should do fairly well."

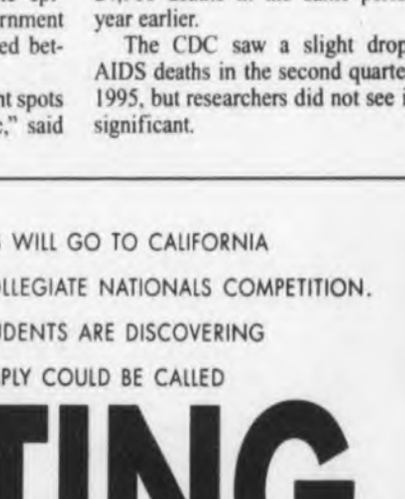
Tim Gust, senior in computer information sciences, management information systems and finance, agrees with Kirkland.

"I have been to national competitions in the past, and I feel that our squad is very good this year," Gust said. "We should do really well."

The competition is open to any school wanting to participate. Participants range from the University of California-Los Angeles to Brigham Young University to the Tigers of the University of Missouri.

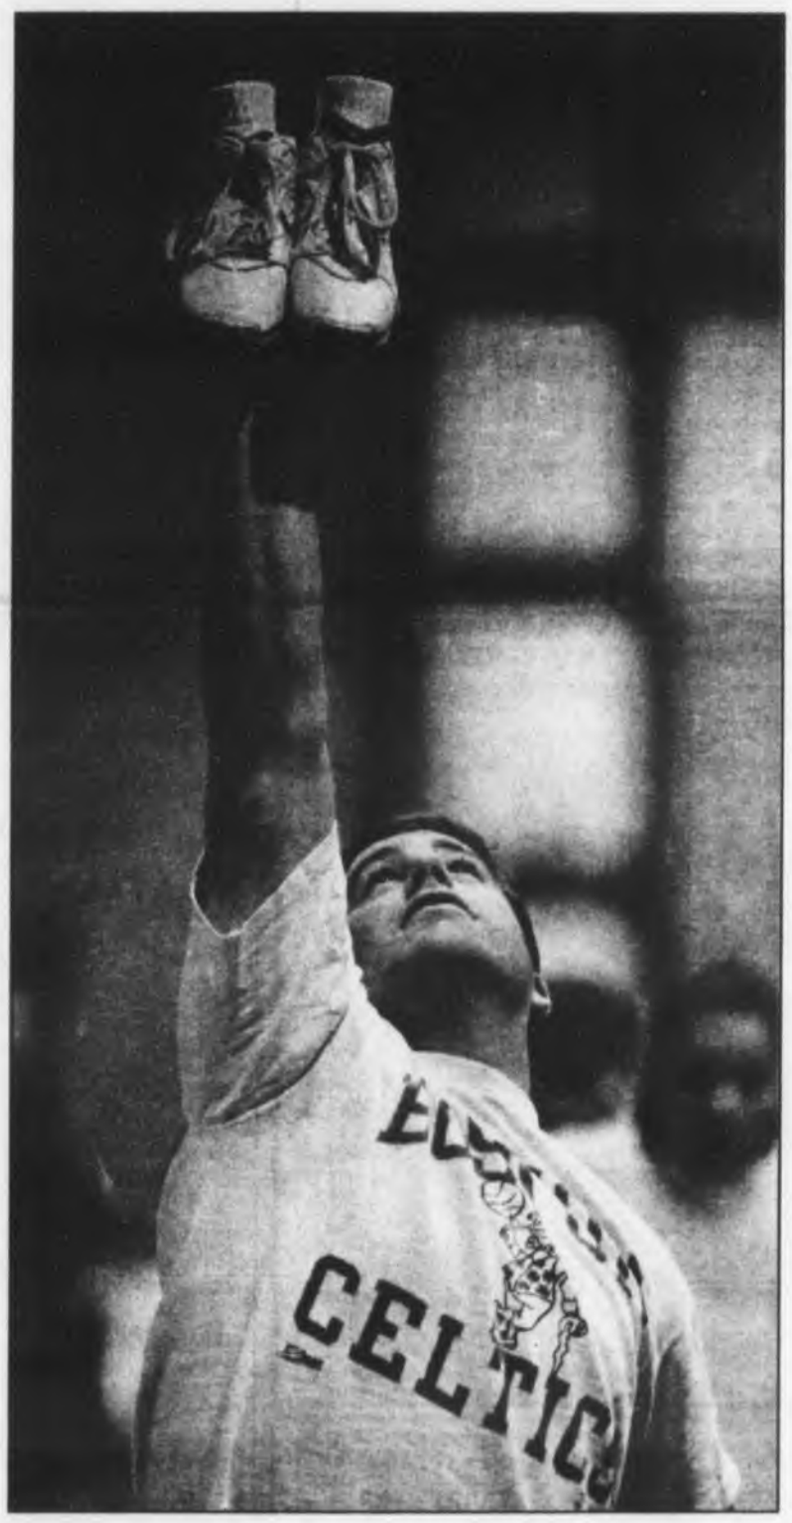
"The last couple of weeks have been very stressful," Jeremy Holder, senior in hotel and restaurant management, said. "During the season, our practice is planned out, but now that we are preparing for a national competition, we don't know what to expect when we get to practice.

"During the season, there is always another game to cheer at, but in a national competition, it is a one-shot deal. There is a lot more pressure at national competitions."



To prepare for nationals, the squad has practiced two to three hours a night for the past 1-1/2 months.

"We know what needs to be accomplished," Will Schwab, senior in economics, said. "Now we just need to set our hearts and minds to it."



This national competition is not like cheering at a sporting event. A cheerleading routine is choreographed and set to music, then the judges score the routine and the highest total wins the competition. Judges score routines on technique, difficulty, timing and overall performance.

The junior varsity cheer squad consists of eight men and seven women. The squad cheers at all home football games, along with women's basketball and volleyball games.

FOR A DOZEN CLASSY CAT SQUAD MEMBERS,
A TRIP TO THE NCA CHEER AND DANCE NATIONALS
IN APRIL REQUIRES SELLING A DICE GAME IN HOPE OF RAISING MONEY

STORY BY REBECCA AISTRUP

A dozen members of the Classy Cat squad will be traveling to the NCA Cheer and Dance Nationals in April. To help pay for the trip, the Classy Cats, in cooperation with Lengendary Games Inc., are selling the Original Farkel Game.

The game consists of six dice and is packaged in a film canister on which the instructions are printed. The object of the game is to be the first player to reach 10,000 points.

"The game has an element of risk or gambling quality to it," Paula Benninga, Classy Cat assistant, said. "People can get really excited, because you can lose a lot of points or win a lot of points in one turn."

▶ Need more info? Call the K-State Marching Band office for more information on where to buy the Original Farkel Game.

Charles Potter of Lengendary Games Inc. is the originator of the product. The game itself has been around for a while, but it has been called several different names.

"Someone taught me the game 15 years ago. I enjoyed the game so much that I started taking it with me where ever I went," Potter said.

Last fall, Lengendary Games Inc. decided to get licensed with K-State and market the pocket version when it learned the Classy Cats needed a fundraiser, Potter said.

The game sells for $5. Of this, $3 goes into the Classy Cat fund and $2 goes to Lengendary Games, Inc., Hope Encinias, Classy Cat member, said.

The game was first sold to tailgaters at the Nebraska-K-State football game last fall.

"We sold over 200 games in about an hour and even some of the Nebraska fans bought some," Encinias said.

The games can be purchased from any member of the Classy Cats or some area businesses.

"It is a game where the whole family can get involved. The more (people) you have playing the game the better it is," Barbara Leiker, Classy Cat coach, said.

"This is a great travel game for people who have a lot of leisure time," Potter said. "We have found that once a person learns how to play the game they get addicted to it."

Senator convicted of misdemeanor

▶ GRADUATE SCHOOL SENATOR found guilty of October lewd and lascivious complaint.

A graduate school senator running for two positions in the upcoming Student Governing Association election was convicted Tuesday of lewd and lascivious behavior.

Avila

Chris Avila, graduate student in secondary education, entered a plea of not guilty following his arrest for this class-B nonperson misdemeanor.

"I am sad and disappointed about the verdict and the way it went," Avila said. "I have to go with the verdict."

A complaint was sworn out on Oct. 6 by Becky Baalman, sophomore in early childhood education.

The complaint said Avila, who lives on the second floor of an apartment building near campus and directly across from her, had masturbated on several occasions in the presence of Baalman and her roommate.

Avila was arrested and released on a $500 bond with the condition there be no contact with Baalman.

"I was quiet the whole time and didn't say anything," Avila said. "I

Senate changes election requirements by setting minimum grade point average

BENJAMIN YODER
staff reporter

Student Senate established a grade point average requirement for people running for office Thursday. Also, a bill to increase the Union Budget failed, but will be reconsidered next week.

Student body president, student body vice president, student senators and Board of Student Publication and Fine Arts Council members will be required to have a 2.0 GPA. People running for Union Governing Board will be required to have a 2.5 GPA. Before the bill was passed, there were no requirements.

Aaron Truax, veterinary medicine senator, said factors other than GPA were as important as GPA.

"Common sense and insight to the world can be just as valuable to a 2.0 grade point average," Truax said.

"Grades are important — yeah, whoo haah hooray," Truax said. "But when you leave here, who cares?"

Arts and Sciences Senator Jay Witt said the requirements would exclude people from gaining the experience of holding office.

"We're putting up walls and barriers to keep people out," Witt said. "We should leave it up to students to how they want to vote."

Robin Cates, arts and sciences senator, said senators are representatives of K-State. She also said athletes who don't have a 2.0 GPA aren't able to play.

"If we don't have a 2.0, we shouldn't be able to play either," Cates said.

The K-State Student Union Budget Increase bill was re-referred to committee 32-14. It would have passed if it would have received three more votes. Six senators were not at Thursday's meeting to vote.

The bill would have increased the budget to just more than $1.1 million for two years. It is an increase of nearly $180,000 increase from last years budget. The majority of the increase would have paid for the federal minimum wage increase.

Nicole Johnson, arts and sciences senator, said she had the opportunity to sit in in the Union Governing Board the past few weeks and was shocked to find out the Union was so strapped.

"The Union so desperately needs money," Johnson said. "I was shocked. I had no clue."

Arts and Sciences Senator Sean Tomb said user fees could be an alternative solution to increasing student fees.

"It's hard for me to justify a $170,000 increase to my constituents," Tomb said. "We won't stand for outrageous fee increases."

Tomb said the Union could cut back employment or services to reduce its budget deficit.

Arrest made near Wefald's house

ANDREA COREY

Wednesday night Jason Lewis Gee, Manhattan resident, was arrested for aggravated assault in front of the President's Residence, 100 Wilson Court, on the K-State campus.

Gee was allegedly involved in an incident with three Junction City men in which he pointed a shotgun at them.

Sgt. Troy Lane of the K-State Police said he and another officer saw the three men driving a car after the incident and stopped them. The men said Gee had pointed the shotgun at them. Gee was arrested and charged with aggravated assault of the three men.

Gee was not acquainted with the men.

"I didn't know them at all," he said.

Gee reported he was allegedly the victim of battery.

"A guy hit me. I don't know why, but yeah, a guy hit me," he said.

None of the three men have been charged with battery.

The police report said that Gee was suspected of using alcohol in the incident. Gee would not comment about whether he had been drinking at the time.

The shotgun was confiscated by police and has been entered in as evidence for the case.

None of the three Junction City men could be reached for comment.

Gee has been released on $2,000 bond.

President Jon Wefald could not be reached for comment.

• ISRAEL DECIDES TO BUILD JEWISH NEIGHBORHOOD IN JERUSALEM.

WASHINGTON — Israel's decision to build a new Jewish neighborhood in Jerusalem could put pressure on President Clinton to come down on one side or the other in his talks next week with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

While Clinton appeared to have been pleased with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's intentions on the Golan Heights, U.S. officials were clearly unhappy with the Israeli Cabinet's unanimous decision Wednesday to develop the first 2,500 of 6,500 planned housing units in East Jerusalem.

In a rare rebuke, the State Department said the decision would erode trust and confidence between Israel and the Palestinians, who are due to resume negotiations in a few weeks.

• PERSIAN GULF WAR CHEMICAL WEAPONS LOGS MISSING.

WASHINGTON — More than three-quarters of the chemical weapons logs kept during the Persian Gulf War are missing, far more than the eight days' worth previously disclosed, the Pentagon reported Thursday.

A computer virus imported by an officer who brought some computer games to Gulf War headquarters might have wiped out half the logs, the report said. Two sets of the logs on disk and a paper copy shipped to U.S. Central Command headquarters in Florida after the war appear to have been lost from a safe in an office move. A third disk set and hard copy were lost from a safe at Aberdeen Proving Ground, Md.

Gulf War veterans concerned about unexplained illnesses that have afflicted them since the war are anxious to know whether the logs mention chemical weapons releases. Many believe chemical weapons caused their illnesses.

• TV EXECUTIVES EVALUATE RATING SYSTEM'S EFFECTIVENESS.

WASHINGTON — With their TV ratings under attack for not giving parents enough information, industry executives showed a willingness Thursday to make adjustments. But they had nothing good to say about the changes critics have been demanding.

"We have rejected nothing," National Association of Broadcasters President Eddie Fritts said at a Senate Commerce Committee hearing on the effectiveness of the ratings the TV industry began using in January.

Fritts, for instance, said the industry is looking into whether on-screen tags suggesting appropriate age groups for shows should appear longer or more frequently. Now, the tag appears in the upper left corner of the picture for the first 15 seconds of a show.

• CONGRESSMAN APOLOGIZES FOR CRITICIZING 'SCHINDLER'S LIST.'

WASHINGTON— A conservative Oklahoma congressman is apologizing for his denouncement of NBC for broadcasting the Holocaust movie "Schindler's List" during family viewing time.

"To all those that I've offended, I offer an apology," Rep. Tom Coburn, a second-term Republican, said Wednesday. "And I personally apologize for appearing insensitive to the worst atrocities known to humankind."

Coburn said he felt terrible that his criticism of NBC for airing this movie has been misinterpreted as a criticism of the film or the millions of Jews who died senselessly during the Holocaust. He called it a landmark movie that profoundly affected him and his family.

He said he believes everyone who is about 16 or older should see it and that his concern was it being aired when younger children might be watching TV.

On Tuesday, Coburn, who heads the conservative Congressional Family Caucus, had said NBC took network television to an all-time low, with full-frontal nudity, violence and profanity. He had said that the network's decision to air the movie Sunday evening should outrage parents and decent-minded individuals everywhere.

aggieville businesses find new neon names as

Signs of Change

STORY BY RUSSELL FORTMEYER PHOTO BY CLIF PALMBERG

New York's Times Square.
Los Angeles' Sunset strip.
Aggieville's Moro Street.

All three of these examples are commercial districts that have one thing in common: unusual signs that contribute to an overall image.

Several Aggieville businesses have recently installed new signs that could easily be termed unconventional, especially in the way they confer to the visual interest of Moro Street.

Java Espresso & Bakery has a new sign that plays on the coffee shop's company logo.

Mark Skochdopole, owner of Java, said he wanted to add a sign that would be more easily seen from the street, rather than the sign that is painted on the building's facade.

"Basically, I wanted something that was unique to catch the eye," Skochdopole said. "It was more to increase the visibility of the store."

Java could have easily chosen a conventional plexiglass sign with a fluorescent backlight, but instead chose a distinctive approach.

The sign is a simple circular design, with the coffee cup logo indirectly lit with white neon. The coffee cup is punched with holes that filter small amounts of the white light through, creating a pleasing, light-washed effect.

"It's not just your run-of-the-mill sign," Skochdopole said. "It's a little more attractive."

Java's sign was designed by S&N Design.

Steve Lee, partner with S&N, said the intention of the sign's inventive look was to add to the varied streetscape of Aggieville.

College of Education provides 2 days for on-campus interviews

The editorial. The editorial board suggests that students take advantage of the campus interviews. Find out why.

JASON ELLIS
staff reporter

With summer quickly approaching, finding that perfect job is on the minds of many students.

For many, interviewing on campus is a regular activity, but for College of Education students, interviewing on campus is limited to two days in the spring.

Bustling students filled the second floor of the K-State Student Union Thursday, the first of two spring interview dates.

"Student teachers are out teaching. This helps them coordinate and take off one day of work," Toni Fink, coordinator of student employment for Career and Employment Services, said. "It is an easy way for superintendents and principals to access large numbers of potential candidates."

Students returning to campus for the interviews said they appreciated the concentration of interviews.

"The one day of interviews allows me to take off just one day from student teaching," Megan Bolinder, senior in secondary education and English, said. "It gives schools a chance to see who is out there."

One negative point, Bolinder said, is the one-day format limits the number of people to be seen because of the number of positions on the schedules.

Thursday's interviews included 24 school districts, coming from Texas, Nebraska, Missouri and all areas of Kansas, Fink said. April 9, the second interview date, consists of about 75 school districts.

Candidates selected one or a combination of three types of interviews. Walk-ups, added this year, allowed students to interview with school districts without signing up prior to the interview, Fink said.

Open schedules gave students access to interview schedules on a first-come, first-serve basis. Preselect schedules, similar to the interview process in Holtz Hall, allowed candidates to request prearranged interviews. Principals and superintendents from various schools chose from submitted résumés the candidates they wished to interview.

College of Education students interviewing for jobs made a lasting impression, returning interviewers said.

"Some kindred spirit in the background and work ethic of people coming to K-State allows them to work well in the Fort Worth district," said Elene Ondo, certification officer and recruiter for the Fort Worth school district. "Anytime an activity is going on, we try to be a part of it."

The Fort Worth school district, Ondo said, participated in the mock interviews in the fall, as well as Thursday's interviews and is scheduled to participate in the April 9 interviews as well.

K-State graduates returning to interview students offered advice to students beginning the interview process.

"Be open-minded in your location and try new things," Jennifer Lilly, K-State graduate, said. "When interviewing, be yourself. They are going to see the real you sometime, so be true from the start."

Delivery driver robbed at gunpoint; no suspects in custody for $168 theft

LILLIAN E. BEEBE
staff writer

A Hardee's delivery driver was robbed at gunpoint shortly before 11 p.m. Monday in an alley of the 800 block of Bluemont Avenue.

The driver was not harmed, but a little shaken up, Daniel Hart, Hardee's crew leader, said.

The robbery is under investigation, and there are no suspects at this time, said Lt. Herb Crosby of the Investigations Division with the Riley County Police Department.

The assailant got away with $102 in cash and $66 in personal checks, Crosby said. He is a between 17 and 25 years of age and approximately 5'11" and 155 pounds. He was wearing solid black clothing with black gloves and a ski mask.

The driver was making a delivery to 823 Bluemont Ave. when the robbery happened, Crosby said.

No one was home, so the driver left through the backyard gate, Crosby said. He noticed a man standing in the alley. When he went to get in his truck the man pointed a shiny automatic handgun at him and ordered him to hand over the money bag.

A press release from RCPD stated that the suspect ordered the driver to lie face down and count to 25, which he did.

Hart said threats have been made before and that a driver was shot at in November, but in his two years with this Hardee's, no driver had ever been robbed to his knowledge.

"We have a limited delivery area that is more concerned with distance than safety," said Hart.

The area extends from Marlatt Avenue to Tuttle Creek Boulevard. Some deliveries are made out as far as Wheatland Motor Cycle Co., but that is at the driver's discretion.

"If we receive a phone call that sounds flaky, we call and verify the order," Hart said.

The driver was given a couple of days off, but Hart said he would not be surprised if the driver does not return to work.

"From this competition, we hope that our junior varsity squad will gain experience for next year and the even bigger national competitions," Kirkland said. "This competition will give them desire to go to the next level, which is a lot different."

The squad members have had numerous fundraisers for the trip to California.

They have put on cheering clinics, participated in date auctions and worked as bartenders.

The squad members said they are excited to go to nationals, especially because they get to go with people they are so well acquainted with.

"Since the beginning of the season, we are one of the best squads I have seen," Maggie Irvin, sophomore in business, and captain of the squad, said. "Not only do we have the talent, but we also get along well with our personalities."

At this point in time, the squad members said they feel comfortable with their routine, but know a lot of work needs to be done.

"We have a very clean routine," said Kyle Tammen, assistant cheerleading coach and head coach of the junior varsity squad. "I think we should do really well. Our pyramids are good, and our overall performance is clean."

A GUIDE TO SECTIONS OF THE COLLEGIAN OPINION PAGE

Columns are opinions expressed by the columnists. The opinions are not necessarily the opinions of the Collegian.

Go get a haircut and a real job when opportunities knock at the campus door

Just like Julius Caesar was warned about the Ides of March, it's time for you to hear the warning.

Dust off those résumés. Press that shirt. Buy some new pantyhose.

The pros are coming to K-State and they might be looking for you.

Every spring, different organizations and colleges on campus bring businesses to K-State in hopes of getting students jobs.

Those organizations and colleges do the hard work that you could end up doing in the real world if you don't take the opportunity they present you now.

You might be asking yourself why you should worry about jobs when graduation could be a few years off.

The answer: Practice, practice, practice.

Sure, when businesses come to K-State for interviews, they are looking for students seeking job opportunities.

Take advantage of this. They will ask tough questions and give you experience when you finally are looking for something to do with the degree you earned.

What should you do to prepare? Get your résumé updated, contact those references and research the prospective employer. Most companies have information on the World Wide Web. You might have to give others a call.

Still want more practice before the interview? Career and Employment Services provides workshops to help you look for summer jobs and internships.

Not sure when a business or workshop is coming to K-State? Check bulletin boards on campus or read the Collegian's Daily Planner on page 2.

If you're prepared you might just avoid Caesar's fate and have a nice job to boot.

Closet Fears

Friend's confession spurs questions and thoughts about homosexuality

I do not understand people.

One of my better friends from high school was talking with me on the phone a few years ago, a conversation during which I expressed a desire to, well, lock my roommate in the closet.

KEN WELLS is a graduate student in theatre. You can e-mail comments to Ken at (sigma7@ksu.edu).

But noted the roommate would eventually have to come "out of the closet." (Not very witty, I know, but it was a Monday, and I am entitled to bad jokes on Mondays.)

My friend did not laugh (that is normal enough) but just chuckled uncomfortably. He made a comment to the effect of "If you knew..." and broke it off.

It was a few months later that he finally came out of the metaphoric closet, an event that really bothered me much more than it should have.

As your basic psychotic heterosexual man, I somehow went into this tailspin of re-examining every subtle detail and nuance of my friend's behavior, looking for signs, some sort of homosexual fingerprint on all of his activities.

Do not ask me why. I could not tell you then, and I can hardly explain it now. All I can think of is, well, trying to understand a lifestyle that made no sense to me.

This is not to say that being straight is a cerebral state. It is just my nature. I do not even think about it.

Point being that that aspect of myself bypasses thought for me. It just is. I tried to keep this in mind when approaching my friend, this and the fact that he is still the same person I had always known, but he just has different social aspirations than I do.

The biggest problem that I had to face was the fact that I was losing my sense of relaxation. Not because of anything he might do, but that I would eventually exercise my legendary speak first, think later (if then) wit and rattle something off that would hit him right in his newfound sense of identity.

The more time wore on, though, he was cracking enough jokes about his orientation that I was relaxed enough to do the same with him.

He did a good job of helping out someone too stubborn to be politically correct or even admit his discomfort in dealing with a situation like this for the first time.

ADRIAN FLEMING/Collegian

Since then, though, I have had to reexamine a few issues that I normally attacked with my usual comatose apathy.

"God hates fags" — uh-huh.

The omnipotent being responsible for the creation, form and sustenance of the entire universe, the entity capable of creating all we know from scratch in six days finds it within himself to actively despise homosexuals? C'mon. All-powerful beings do not need to hate because they're bigger than everybody else.

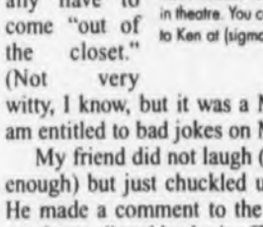
Gay marriages — I do not think gay couples should marry. I do not think straight couples should marry.

Should people get this romantic urge within their souls, they should just save the time and trouble and bang their heads against a concrete pillar and toss their money out the nearest window, but that's another column.

"AIDS is God's revenge on homosexuals" — I've got two words for you. Ryan White. Or, better yet, two more: Kimberly Bergalis.

Gays in the military — So sexual orientation affects how straight someone shoots?

I can accept the President Clinton compromise of "Don't ask, don't tell" in the light of possible morale conflicts.



I know lots of people who are homosexual, and there are people you and I do not know are homosexual. But deriving the entirety of people's identity from one aspect of their lives is just stupid.

No person is that simple.

Accept the complexities of the people you know, and do not let a glint of light bouncing off one facet of a person blind you to the rest of them.

Tiananmen Square incident blackens Deng's legacy

What does the future hold for human rights in China?

JEFF CHAN is a graduate student in English. You can e-mail comments to Jeff at (defcon1@ksu.edu).

There is a quote I have come across that for some time now that has served me unlike any other aphorism for its beauty, poetry and diamond-sharp cutting toward truth: "Who knows the destruction amongst these fascinating days?"

The quote is from a letter written by a friend of my family's from Japan, and it shines out of a page of translated and deciphered English like a gem.

In the past week, I have read about the Japanese company that has developed biotechnology to the point of controlling cockroaches, and I have read about the first cloning of an adult mammal from cells not used in reproduction, previously thought impossible.

I have also read about gun-spraying on the Empire State Building and domestic terrorist acts upon pro-choicers and homosexuals in Atlanta.

And, curiously enough, despite it's being the evening of the twentieth century, the sun is rising in the East. Europe seems to have dominated the world stage (at least as we Americans see it) for some time now, what with its collapsing communism, Bosnian-Serbian wars and the like, but I have the sneaking suspicion that Asia will once again steal the spotlight and, if the cards are not played right, see to it that this century does not go quietly into that good night.

All dramatics aside, the sun is up, and it is time to awaken.

North Korea, really the last hard-line Stalinist-style communist nation left, is on the verge of experiencing one of the worst famines in recorded history.

Despite requests for American aid, the United States will not send it insisting that North Korea accept the aid offered them by South Korea, itself becoming an economic powerhouse, aid which has been refused in the past.

The military situation in that region has been really touchy the past few years. Despite this, chances of officially ending the Korean War have never looked brighter.

All this was overshadowed by the news of the death of Deng Xiaoping, leader of the People's Republic of China since the late seventies, a week ago last Wednesday.

Deng, praised both here and abroad for his market-reform philosophies and eradication of outdated and ineffectual Maoist policies, will be remembered as the leader who moved China into the 21st century, coupling his country's bureaucratic communism with limited capitalist (but not democratic) inflence.

MATT HAWKINS/Collegian

Some economic forecasters predict that if China's bounce forward continues, it will become the next superpower by the mid-21st century.

Paul Parsons, professor of journalism and mass communications, was quoted in Monday's Collegian as saying Deng succeeded in holding China together during the aftermath of the Cultural Revolution and into a market-based economy, and "the 1989 Tiananmen Square incident was his one black mark."

That's a hell of a black mark. In fact, it must be big enough to blot out all the other black marks of Deng's China.

Deng's favorite saying is often being quoted in news reports of his death: "It doesn't matter if a cat is black or white, as long as it catches mice." Too true...just ask any political prisoner currently held in Chinese prisons, or practically any Tibetan you might meet.

It is ironic that Deng, himself once labeled "that number two capitalist roader" by Mao's Red Guards and imprisoned for opposing the "Great Leap Forward" proposed by Mao, should cite the welfare of the people as the purpose for economic reforms, yet give the order to gun down student reform-minded protesters, helpless like mice in a trap.

Ngawang Choephel, the Tibetan documentary filmmaker arrested in 1995 for making a film about Tibetan music, and who was moved to the capital of Tibet last year in what human rights observers believed was a sign of imminent release, has been sentenced to 18 years in prison.

His is only one example of the cat-and-mouse tactics employed against so-called enemies of the state.

Newly-appointed Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, is in China this week pressing for better ties between China and the United States.

Human rights issues, fundamental, it seems, to everything and anything else, are on her agenda, as is America's relationship with Taiwan and Hong Kong, set to go back under Chinese control from the British this summer.

Human rights have always been at issue with China, and have always been subordinated to economic concerns. America's continued granting of Most Favored Nation trading status to the China is proof of this.

How can any society even pretend to make great leaps forward while stepping on their own citizens?

How many revolutions will it take before the blood shed at Tiananmen Square can be absolved?

China, with some 22 percent of the world's population, and North Korea, that bastion of failed policy, would both do well to nurture their most important natural resource: their people.

Any other kind of curiosity may just kill the cat.

• READER DISAPPOINTED WITH LACK OF K-STATE BASKETBALL FAN SUPPORT.

Editor,

I am a member of the K-State Pep Band, and after observing K-State basketball games for almost two full seasons, I would like to take this opportunity to express my opinion about the fantastic crowd support given to the K-State basketball teams. I believe we here at K-State have the greatest fans in the country.

First of all, what other team can honestly say their crowd packs out at least 50 percent of three or four sections in a coliseum the size of Bramlage every game? Furthermore, those fans are virtually exploding with enthusiasm and excitement, which is dramatically evident when several of them actually make noise and clap after we score points or when we need to distract the opposing team's offense.

I love it when people start leaving the game when there's still five minutes left to play. It really gives me a great sense of pride and loyalty in our team, and I'm sure the players appreciate it, too. Let's keep that great tradition alive!

One of the greatest sections is the side which is composed mostly of alumni. It is an especially lively and ecstatic section, and it's easy to see just how prone they are to spontaneous outbursts of nojse and cheering when they actually get up and stretch at halftime!

My favorite section, though, has to be the student section. I mean, really, how much more peppy can you get? I would guess that at least a majority of them actually stand for the duration of the game. A few even join in the cheers being led by the cheerleaders and pep band. Some people even remember the words to the fight song, and they sing along.

I also think it's really neat how there's usually so much noise in the place that you actually have to strain to hear someone whispering at you from across the court. I'll bet that really annoys the visiting team! It makes me wish I'd brought ear plugs.

Yes siree, I think our basketball teams are lucky to have such a great crowd as this. Don't you agree?

• STUDENT ART DESERVES MORE RESPECT THAN IT GETS.

Editor,

I want to thank Russell Fortmeyer for his support of the Union art gallery, as well as his general support for the arts on this campus.

He had good things to say in his opinion column Wednesday. I just thought I would point out that student work is on display regularly in Willard Hall along the hallways.

Student work will be shown again at Commerce Bank for the Student Comprehensives next month. Student work is also sometimes shipped to England for shows in exchange with the Norwich School of Art and Design. Also, the Potters Guild often displays work for sale in the K-State Student Union.

Hallways, even the wide ones we found, are off limits for exhibits except flatwork because of fire safety regulations. No stands, no work that sticks out and no objects on the floor, etc., make it a limited venue for exhibitions.

I agree, an exhibit does not need to be up for very long to have an effect. However, much money and time is required to make art work professionally presentable for exhibition and for it to be up for only a day or two might not compensate for this fact.

So, thanks, Fortmeyer for nudging our future artists to exhibit their work more frequently, but keep in mind, that there are some limitations to how much they might be able and willing to do for the sake of art.

• READER ARGUES FOR SENSITIVITY OF MALES.

Editor,

I would just like to respond to David Griffith's attitude toward men. Griffith, spare me. How many men do you know?

While I won't claim to speak for all men, I will speak for myself and 99 percent of the men I have known. We are not all infantile emotional eunuchs. We do not all reduce women "to submissive dependent playthings."

I have been married for more than a year, and my wife and I had a relationship for several years before that. We are equal partners, share responsibilities and are quite happy. I listen and respond to her emotional needs, and we devote a lot of time to developing an even closer relationship.

The vast majority of my male friends, relatives and associates all enjoy the same mindset. It sounds to me as if you are projecting your own guilt onto other men. I have no need for the "macho pose" you described.

I am quite aware of my faults and accept them without the need for such a facade. The only thing your letter demonstrates is that you hold a very utopic view of female sexuality and a dismal view on male emotions and sexuality. Maybe you ought to survey those of us who don't fit into your little stereotype.

Writer gets choked up at the old days of baseball

Someone once said there is no crying in baseball.

I can tell you first hand the game may change your mind.

If you call yourself a true fan, a bona fide lover of the game, one of these days baseball will strike you the way it strikes me.

No matter how calloused you think you are, one of these days the tears will roll and goose bumps will crawl when the national anthem is sung. If you call yourself a true fan, someday, your favorite memories will revolve around a baseball game.

TARA WRAY

TARA WRAY is a freshman in print journalism. You can e-mail comments to Tara at (twray @ksu.edu).

Let me first begin by saying this column is not going to be a tearjerker (we do not have room for that kind of stuff on the sports page anyway), though it may border on sappy at times. Proceed with caution.

Sometimes baseball is as powerful as the thought of world peace. Sometimes, as in everything else, it can be ho-hum. But when it is right, good God-almighty, look out.

It is the green of the grass, the blue of the sky, the funky color of the drunk guy next to you; it all contributes to the flavor of the game.

With that said, let me address baseball's single most important legacy — the memories the game helps foster.

Those are long more important than any strike count or triple-play ball. Sadly, though I do not see people watching baseball, or any game for that matter, for the pure joy of it.

Maybe people should look back to their childhoods when they loved something just because.

Just because of the way it made them feel. Just because of the way their heart pounded when their favorite player stepped up to the plate.

I love baseball just because.

When I was little, I would spend summer afternoons with my grandparents, watching the Chicago Cubs chase the ball around Wrigley Field (that, by the way, is what fielding consisted of for the Cubs; chasing the ball and trying not to run into each other). But I did not care. It was fun anyway.

Mind you our afternoons consisted of lounging in an air-conditioned house, smack dab in the middle of Kansas (far, far from Clark and Addison). It is the closest thing to heaven I can remember.

I have always been a fan of of the Cubs (do not ask me why) so try to forget about that frost on your window and hear me out about my favorite summer pastime.

What could be better I ask you, than an afternoon lounging around watching a game whiz by, losing track of the count, but still loving every minute of it?

My grandma would make us peach milkshakes, and we would shut out the world for nine innings. The day was sweeter than the peaches. But nostalgia does not grow on trees, you know. It is something you have to be taught to appreciate and those afternoons were character building experiences. You learn a lot about humility watching a team that loses more games than it wins.

Whether your team wins or loses, every game should be the stuff dreams are made of — not just something you watch because there's nothing else on.

And if you are lucky enough to actually witness a game first hand, savor every single moment of it.

In retrospect, it was not the pitching and hitting I remember most about the good 'ol days. It was the ambiance that struck me (though back then I did not know ambiance from a hole in the ground).

Clear as a bell I can remember my grandpa hollering at each run the Cubs managed to bang home — there was not much hollering, though. I can see my grandma, not quite paying attention, but still getting a kick out of our excitement.

Though I was 2,000 miles away from Wrigley Field, I could smell the freshly mown grass and the steaming peanuts as if I was sitting in one of those sticky bleachers myself. I did not care if the Cubbies won or lost, I just wanted to hear Harry Caray sing his song.

And when he sang, the world sang too (or at least my grandparents and I did). I am sure we were a funny sight; three Kansans doing the wave in the middle of their living room.

While those afternoons have long since passed (WGN, where have you gone?) the memories are not to be forgotten.

You should get out there and foster some memories of your own. Spend an afternoon where you lose track of time watching a ball game. Follow each pitch and pay close attention to every detail of the game.

You might just like it. If all goes right, you may cross that line from watcher of the game to lover of the game.

If that happens — get the tissues ready.

Cats beat Missouri in last seconds, finish season against Baylor Bears

SUN DEE MILLS
sports writer

The free throw is a fundamental shot that can be perfected in practice but is an unknown entity in a game.

Fortunately for the Wildcat women's basketball team, the entity was a reality as it sank four charity shots in the last 26 seconds to ice the game against the Missouri Tigers Wednesday night, 64-60.

The Cats took a 10-point lead into halftime, but the Tigers took the lead at the 6:47 mark in the second half. With a minute left in the game, the Tigers were up 60-59. Tiger fouls saved the Cats.

Tiger center Susan Dixon fouled K-State center Angie Finkes, and Finkes connected on one of her two free throws to tie the game. The Tigers traveled on their next possession, and Dixon then fouled forward Andria Jones.

Jones hit both of her free shots, and point-guard Missy Decker had the same opportunity at the charity stripe. With 10 seconds left in the game, Decker sank her shots to take the game away from the Tigers.

"It was a tough game to win," Cat coach Deb Patterson said. "Missouri played well, especially in the second half."

In the Feb. 1 game in Manhattan, the Cats beat the Tigers 77-42. Patterson said the Tigers were capable of playing at a different level.

"I felt the game Missouri played in Manhattan was not indicative of their ball club," Patterson said.

Jones' 22 points moved her into the 1,000 point club with fellow Cat guard Brit Jacobson. Jones has posted 1,014 in her career so far, and added nine rebounds and three assists during the game.

"I think it's a testament, not only for the type of year she's had for the program, but for the quality career she's had at Kansas State," Patterson said.

The game was the first in 12 that Decker did not connect from behind the arc. She went 0-4 from the three-point line.

The Cats move to 16-9 overall and 9-6 in the conference with the win. Tomorrow, the Cats travel to Waco, Texas, to take on the Baylor Bears at the Ferrel Center for their final game of the season.

Patterson said the Missouri win should give the team the edge they need to compete with the Bears.

"We've said all along that we've got to win on the road to be successful in this league," Patterson said. "It should give us confidence that we have the ability to win a close game on the road."

K-State hopes for win to end Big 12 season

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

It may be a blessing in disguise for the K-State men's basketball team, but nonetheless it is here. The Cats close out their regular season Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum against Missouri.

The Tigers handed K-State a 22-point drubbing in Columbia a month ago, just right before the Tigers spanked the No. 1 Jayhawks in double-overtime in what could be called Missouri's best game of the season.

But since then the Tigers have lost a little gumption, dropping four of their last five. Furthermore, Missouri (13-15, 5-10) has not won a conference road game to date.

On the other hand, K-State (9-16, 2-13) has lost some poise as of late going down to Baylor Wednesday in Bramlage Coliseum 75-58.

Now the Cats are just looking to make that final plunge out of last place in the conference with a win on Saturday.

"All we can do is try to win against Missouri and then go into the tournament and make things respectable," guard Mark Young said.

With a K-State victory on Saturday and a Texas A&M loss on Sunday, the Cats would share a tie for 11th in the conference with A&M, but would claim the 12th seed in the tournament facing the No. 5 seed which appears to be Texas Tech.

"Nobody wants to be in last place and, ya know, we got it so I guess we're going to have to deal with it," forward Manny Dies said.

For the Cats to record just their third conference win on Saturday, Coach Tom Asbury said his team will have to shoot the ball much better.

"We can't shoot 35 percent and expect to win," Asbury said. "There are going to have to be some changes made."

It is the final home game for center Gerald Eaker. Eaker has been all but satisfied with his final year donning a Wildcat uniform.

"It's been frustrating, and we have had ups and downs," Eaker said. "Hopefully we can get a couple of wins here at the end."

Thus K-State's chapter in the first year of the Big 12 comes to a close tomorrow and the sole thing that may shine a bright spot on it would be a victory.

"Our season has been done for a while, but we kept feeling like we had a chance," Dies said. "We'll come out and play 100 percent and hopefully we can pull out a win."

Baseball to open season against Missouri; team faces struggles in upcoming games

JEREMY KELLEY

The K-State baseball team opens Big 12 play today at Frank Myers Field against last year's Big 8 regular-season champion, Missouri.

"Yeah, it's going to be a heck of a challenge," Coach Mike Clark said. "I just hope we're competitive enough to play with them."

Not only does K-State (5-1), which currently sits at third in the conference, open the Big 12 season this weekend, but the next three weekends are packed full of conference opponents — Oklahoma State, Texas and Texas A&M.

Clark said that combination was enough to scare the Cats into playing better.

"We are playing four of the best teams in the conference right off hand," he said. "Whether we're ready or not here it comes."

Last year Missouri made a worst-to-first turnaround in the Big 8 and made its first NCAA Tournament appearance since 1991, posting a 39-19 record overall and 20-8 in conference play, nabbing the top seed in the conference's tournament in its final year.

Maybe Missouri has lost its touch from a year ago, falling in four of its past six games. However, on its last outing, Missouri won 18-4.

Not only that, but the Tigers return eight of Athletes to compete in Atlanta this weekend; Cats fine tune skills for NCAA championships

The K-State track and field team will attempt to fine tune its skills this weekend in Atlanta, at the USA Indoor Championships before heading to the NCAA Championships next weekend.

Five athletes, who are preparing for the NCAAs, are heading to Georgia: triple jumper Vanitta Kinard, sprinters Karissa Stewart and Travis Livingston, and weight throwers Renetta Seiler and Kirsten Schultz. Meanwhile, the other members of the team will travel north to Iowa State for another meet.

Coach Cliff Rovelto said he was not specifically training for the NCAA tournament this weekend, but rather the whole season was dedicated to this pinnacle to close the season out.

"It's not a week-to-week thing. It's a huge picture," Rovelto said. "You always have to work towards that one level of competition and that's what we have been doing."

Steve Fritz, throwers coach, said this week the throwers have been preparing ideally to peak at NCAAs and are competing this weekend just to keep the same routine.

"It's real hard for them to peak three weekends in a row," Fritz said. "The best thing we can have them do is to prepare normally. We try to keep them in that throwing routine."

Two of K-State's more prominent throwers, Seiler and Schultz, are both going to Atlanta. Seiler has already automatically qualified for the NCAAs, but Fritz said he hoped this meet

SERVED WITH A SMILE

Tennis player finds success on, off the court

STORY BY SHANE McCORMICK • PHOTOS BY STEVE HEBERT

You can usually find junior Lena Piliptchak with a smile stretched across her face. This has brought upon the nickname, Smilie, from her friends and fans.

Piliptchak has given the K-State tennis team a lot to smile about this year, helping the Cats accumulate a 4-1 record.

The Cats will try to improve on their record Saturday at 10 a.m. in Ahearn Field House, when they play host to Texas Tech.

It was over two years ago that Piliptchak heard about K-State from former Cat player Karina Kuregian. Kuregian's father, a tennis coach, informed Cat coach Steve Bietau about Piliptchak and her abilities on the court.

Piliptchak, who had seen Kuregian play, said knowing Kuregian was at K-State helped her decision.

"Having Karina at K-State was very credible for their tennis program," Piliptchak said.

Once she got to K-State, Piliptchak had to adjust to changes off and on the court.

Off the court, challenges such as a new language and culture faced her. It did not take too long for her to pick up the English language, and Piliptchak said her teammates made her feel more comfortable.

"When I got here, all of my teammates were a big help. They really were understanding and made me feel welcome," Piliptchak said.

The biggest change on the court for Piliptchak would be adjusting to a new court surface. At home, Piliptchak played mostly on clay courts. When she got to K-State, she had to get used to playing all games on a hard-court surface.

"When I played on the clay surface, I just stayed back and played from the baseline," she said. "Playing on the hard courts, I had to try and come to the net more and take control."

Playing mostly at the No. 3 singles position last year, Piliptchak struggled at times, accumulating a 12-16 overall record. In doubles, she teamed up with Kuregian to put together a very productive season.

Playing at mostly the No. 1 position, the duo recorded an 16-8 overall record and were the doubles runner-up at the Big 8 Championships.

In the NCAA Championships, they teamed up to defeat the No. 13 ranked team in the nation, Kylie Hunt and Jenny Atkerson of Kansas in straight sets.

This season Piliptchak has been on a roll, serving up four straight wins, improving her record to 4-1. In her last match against Tulsa, she disposed of her opponent in less than an hour in a 6-0, 6-0 win.

Piliptchak said improving her serve was the key to her improvement.

"I have really worked on putting a more aggressive serve in," she said. "I used to stay at the baseline all the time, so it really didn't matter how hard I served the ball. But now, I am putting a more flatter serve in and coming in behind it."

Bietau, who said Piliptchak has done the most with her game over the last month, shared the same sentiments.

"The harder, flatter serve was the missing piece of the puzzle," Bietau said. "She had always been a great volleyer, but her serve wasn't forcing any weak, short balls from her opponent.

"Her serve now is opening up possibilities to attack. She is really playing with a lot of confidence now."

LENA PILIPTCHAK has helped guide the K-State women's tennis team to a 4-1 record this spring. Born in Ukraine, Piliptchak came to K-State in part because of former player Karina Kuregian.

Piliptchak has not limited her success to just on the court either. Off the court, she continues to excel in the classroom. Piliptchak carries a 4.0 grade point average, majoring in accounting and

THE REAL DEAL

▶ WHATEVER FEELS GOOD FOR members of Red Eldon results in 'Little Apple homegrown' style of music for their listeners.

Mike Krug, senior in history, wasn't handing out any small compliments to the members of Red Eldon as they started their show.

"They can actually play their instruments, which is rare," he said.

Krug is also a singer and guitarist for Back Porch Mary. He said there is a difference between being able to play instruments and being able to make good music.

"They can do that, too," he said. "That's even rarer."

Music Review

Heath Dumler, vocalist for Red Eldon, said he was impressed by the size of the crowd in the upstairs of Bombers.

"I couldn't see the floor between the people," he said.

The members of Red Eldon — Dumler, Brandon Lapo on drums, Jake Goheen on bass, and Brandon Mock on guitar — don't have a lot of words to describe what they do or why they do it. Goheen said that's the whole point.

"We just do whatever feels good," he said. "We want the music to speak for itself.

"It's better than living in a trailer park."

Dumler pled the Fifth Amendment when first asked to describe Red Eldon's style, but eventually came up with a description he liked.

"Call it Little Apple homegrown," he said.

Red Eldon opened for fellow Manhattan band Ruskabank. Between the two, they managed to fill the room with fans.

"This is the biggest crowd I've seen since the Urge played here," Seth Olson said.

Goheen said Olson was Red Eldon's biggest fan. Olson plays for another band, June's Beaver.

"Red Eldon is the funkiest punk band I know," Olson said.

The band has been in existence for six months in its current incarnation. Before that, it had a different vocalist, whom the three instrumentalists were reluctant to talk about.

Goheen knew Dumler from high school in Topeka, when the latter sung for another band, Kvasir. Years later, after the two graduated and went their separate ways, they both ended up in Manhattan.

The band has a relatively simple songwriting process; Mock and Goheen hammer out a tune with Lapo, and Dumler adds lyrics later.

Red Eldon doesn't reveal all its influences, but the members definitely love Jimi Hendrix. The Ballroom dancing champion Michael Keith Withers was convicted in Perth, Australia, of the attempted 1994 murder of his wife-dance partner, Stacey Larson.

FEEL THE BURN

He had said it was an accident, but the jury found that he had doused her with gasoline (set aside to use in a Whipper Snapper lawn trimmer he had borrowed from a neighbor) and set her afire, burning 70 percent of her body.

Stacey Larson testified that she had not seen Withers since the incident, but under cross-examination finally admitted that she had slept with him 15 times since then, and another witness said Larson had bought Withers Christmas gifts in 1995, including his very own Whipper Snapper.

PTA fundraiser celebrates Mardi Gras

BRANDON ROMBERGER
staff reporter

Face painting, cake walks and musical performances by children enticed the crowd at the Fort Riley Elementary School Thursday night.

The smell of cotton candy and freshly popped popcorn filled the air as the PTA sponsored the second annual Mardi Gras Carnival and Arts Festival.

The carnival was a collaboration of the PTA along the with the parents and the community. It was an opportunity for the PTA to raise money and have the children showcase their talents.

There was no charge for admission, the children bought tickets for 25 cents each. They used the tickets to participate in 12 different activities. There was a magician along with golf, paper hat making and many other activities.

The carnival is the PTA's biggest fund raiser. Money was raised through ticket sales, hot dogs, baked potatoes and drinks. Children were able to showcase their talents on stage performing musical numbers along with comedy acts and jumping rope.

Community members came out in support of the carnival. The Junction City Dixie Band performed for 30 minutes. The Washington Dance Studio Performance Co. came from Manhattan.

"It's a time to bring the community together in celebration," Becky Lay, principal of Fort Riley Elementary, said. "The only problem with the carnival is that it isn't long enough."

This was the second year for the carnival. Last year the response to the inaugural carnival was great said Alice Ivy. She was quick to say toward whom the carnival was aimed.

"The children are the main point. It enriches their art experience. The money we make is put back to use for the children," Ivy said.

Capt. Dave Scheider, Chaplin, and a graduate student in family studies and human services, was one of the many parents that came out to support the children. He said this was one of the few times all the parents could come together and allow the kids to let off a little steam. He said it was more of a morale builder than anything else.

"It's good time of the year to have it. The kids are bored. There's not much to do outside," Scheider said.

He and his family have been stationed all over the country with the U.S. Army. He said this was one of best schools he has seen. Scheider also said he was impressed with the community and the quality of the teachers.

"They go out of their way to make sure the kids blend in and have an easy transition," he said.

Speaker acknowledges turmoil with Palestinian, U.S. relations

CLAUDETTE RILEY
news editor

Echoing the turmoil of the region, criticism on the oppression of Palestinians and the continuing U.S. role in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict sparked fiery debate in a lecture on the Middle East Thursday.

Norton Mezvinsky, a professor of history at Central Connecticut State University, discussed the modern theory of Jewish nationalism called Zionism.

"This conflict began by a modern theory of Jewish nationalism," Mezvinsky said. "All aspects of conflict have derived from that secular-based nationalism."

Mezvinsky said this theory is based on the belief in a specific Jewish people, the existence of anti-Semitism and the need for a designated nation where Jewish people can live without persecution.

Citing present citizenship laws in Israel following the Oslo I and Oslo II agreements, Mezvinsky said an Apartheid system has been created in Gaza and the West Bank that favors Jews, even in the quality of roads, expense of general utilities and punishment for crimes.

"There has been terrorism on all sides," Mezvinsky said. "The terrorism and violence comes from the Palestinians being a victim of the creation of a state which is exclusive and grants rights and privileges to Jews but not the indigenous people of that land."

Mezvinsky said the unwillingness of U.S. leaders to recognize PLO leaders as more than refugees and terrorists before 1975 helped Israel oppress the Palestinians.

"We are dealing with a conflict, that if you look at from any reasonable side, the victims have been the Palestinians," Mezvinsky said.

The amount of official aid to Israel from 1948-95 was more than $65 billion, Mezvinsky said.

"Political, economic and military support from and by the United States has been evident since before the creation of a Jewish state," he said. "Israel's economic support from the U.S. has been astonishing, astonishing."

America's need for a trusted ally in the Middle East and pressure from the powerful pro-Israeli lobby within the U.S. government were two reasons cited by Mezvinsky for the amount of aid and loan guarantees for Israel.

Mezvinsky said Israel's refusal to discuss compromising their sovereignty and security concerns have continued to victimize the Palestinian people.

"Israeli policies have severely limited Palestinian policy options," Mezvinsky said. "It is apparent that Palestinians don't have control, even on a local level, over their economic situation."

Yassar Arafat, leader of the PLO, has continued meeting with Israeli leaders to negotiate the role of Palestinians in the region.

"What makes this even worse is that the Palestinian leadership has been a partner in their oppression," Mezvinsky said.

Issues in the region, from Jewish settlements to Israeli-Syrian negotiations about the Golan Heights, have continued to stir controversy.

"The prospects, at best, are prospects for the situation to remain much as it is," Mezvinsky said. "I wish I could be more optimistic."

Laughter and disagreement rose within the audience repeatedly toward the end of Mezvinsky's lecture.

Dana Greene, graduate student in theater, said she was concerned Mezvinsky's lecture was titled "U.S., Israel and Palestine" but was clearly from a pro-Palestinian vantage point.

"He didn't speak about all the elements of situation or talk about all sides," Greene said. "So, I think it's a very unprofessional lecture, and to talk about the problems of the Middle East without saying all sides was wrong."

Greene, an Israeli, said she felt Mezvinsky chose selective historical documentation to make his points.

"This is a painful situation for us and every side has done some wrong," Greene said. "That's why you can't paint it as black and white but have to look at it from all sides."

Don Mrozek, professor of history, said Mezvinsky understands how Islam, Christianity and Judaism have altered the politics of the Middle East.

"He has a great understanding of Mid-East history and Arab-Israeli relations," Mrozek said. "This is an area where we don't currently have a faculty member, and it's nice to have someone visiting here who concentrates on this area."

Mezvinsky spoke to classes in the history and political science departments. He is the author of several books about the Middle East including "Anti-Zionism: Analytical Reflections" and "The Meir Kahana Phenomenon," which will be released this fall. He is working on a book about Jewish fundamentalism in Israel.

The lecture was sponsored by K-State's department of history and Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee.

Icy sidewalks trip up students walking to early morning classes

SHANE MCCORMICK
staff writer

Snow flurries and cold temperatures led to icy conditions on campus Thursday morning.

The conditions made it difficult for some students to walk to their morning classes.

The Division of Facilities called in their crews at around 3:30 Thursday morning to start working.

"First, we went around and just tried to get the snow cleared off," John Ott, director of services, said. "Then we came back and laid Ice Melt and some sand down on the outlaying sidewalks."

Ott said he went back on campus around 7:30 a.m. to check the conditions.

"It was really spotty in areas," he said. "It would be really slick in some areas, then there would be a long stretch of dry spots. There really wasn't one spot or another that was more slick."

Despite the efforts of the crews, students had difficulties on many parts of campus.

"The sidewalks were heavily iced. They were very slick," Joe Koerner, senior in mechanical engineering, said.

"Coming up, and especially down the hill by Shellenberger Hall, people were having trouble. People were having to walk on the grass because of the ice," he said.

Students, like Koerner, who had early classes, had to deal with the conditions before the sun came out to help melt the ice.

"Walking in the quad area, going to the library at 8:30 this morning was extremely difficult," Koerner said. "There wasn't any salt that had been laid down. The snow was swept off, but there was still sheets of ice."

Ott said he went back on campus around 9:30 a.m. to find the ice melting quickly because of the sun.

Because of the sun, students who had later classes only had to deal with slush, not the earlier icy conditions.

"I really didn't have any problems — mostly everything had melted on campus," Susan Miller, senior in architectural engineering, said. "Everything was pretty wet, but none of the areas seemed to be slick."

nine position players from last year's team. Furthermore, Missouri has most of their pitching staff back, a staff that fueled its rise to the top of the Big 8.

"They definitely have the experience factor," Clark said. "Almost every member of their bullpen is back for them this year."

But let's not forget K-State's pitching staff. That staff has posted 60 strikeouts in 10 games, including 13 apiece by Jon Oiseth and Eric Yanz.

To continue the Cats' success on the mound, the pitchers have to do what they do best — throw strikes.

"We're coming off some good wins where us pitchers have just thrown strikes," relief pitcher David Johnson said. "As long as we keep doing that and getting everyone in, we'll prepare better and better for the Big 12 and keep the ball rolling."

Clark said for K-State, this is just a test.

"This will be tough, but if we play well it will bode well for the future," he said.

On Friday, Oiseth steps out on the mound first for K-State in the nightcap at 7. Saturday it's Yanz's pitch at 3 p.m. and Chris Traylor finishes out the series on Sunday at 1 p.m. finance.

On top of that, she also speaks three different languages and is on her way to speaking a fourth. Piliptchak is trying to expand her foreign vocabulary by auditing a French class. Due to her already busy academic and tennis schedule, Piliptchak did not feel she had time for the five credit hour class.

As for her future plans, Piliptchak said she would like to work for a year and go to a good graduate school on the east coast.

After that, she said she would eventually like to return to the Ukraine and work for a international company in business.

Despite all the plans for her future, Piliptchak said it will be hard to keep tennis out of them.

"I will try to keep playing from time to time," she said. "I've played tennis for 15 years, I don't think I will ever be able to just gave it up."

SIGNS

"We had a good client, who was willing to let us push the edge," Lee said.

But Lee said the sign isn't a highly original design and would be conventional in a larger city.

"The idea behind signs is that it's the first impression a retailer can make before people walk through the door," Lee said. "If you can make your sign and message different, you're going to catch people's attention."

S&N is mainly a graphics design firm. It designed the logo used on Java's menu and cups. However, the firm works with many architects on signs and other architectural details.

"It's a blending between architecture and graphic design," Lee said. "We took a two-dimensional logo created years ago and created a three-dimensional sign. It's an integrated package."

Lee said the more seamless a company can make an image, the more effect it will have.

On the Wildside has added a new sign to its storefront in the past few months.

An abstract, circular explosion of dark pinks, blues and yellows highlights the store's entrance. But unlike the Java sign, which is clearly a coffee cup, On the Wildside's sign is pure abstraction, with little literal reference to the store's merchandise.

Gary Bedenharn, owner of Wildside, said he wanted a new sign to match the store's new logo.

"Being in Aggieville, I thought neon would be a good touch," Bedenharn said. "If I was downtown, I wouldn't put neon on it.

"It's kind of a wild thing."

On the Wildside's sign was designed by Phil Whalen, senior in architecture.

Cheryl Siebens, executive director of the Aggieville Business Association, said her organization cannot mandate what business owners can use for signs.

"We don't have any restrictions as far as the association telling businesses what they can and can't do," Siebens said.

Although there are no unusual zoning restrictions, outside of general city regulations, an Aggieville Business Association committee created an improvement plan in 1982 that was meant to encourage businesses to consider aesthetic qualities in their buildings.

In its published report, the committee suggested signage in Aggieville be restrained and not add to the current clutter of large, competitive, eye-grabbing devices.

But some might argue the current clutter is what reinforces Aggieville's festive image.

Tony Chelz, associate professor of landscape architecture, dabbles in creating signs. He designed Java's over-the-counter sign at the request of architect Brent Bowman.

"One hopes for a certain vitality that doesn't result in chaos," Chelz said, while sitting in Java and looking to the signs that dot Moro Street.

Chelz said he thought potential customers expect a certain level of sensitivity in signage to take a retailer seriously.

The new signs — especially Java's coffee cup — also hearken back to older signs that were heavily symbolic.

"Signs were originally symbolic and pictorial before literacy was widespread," Chelz said.

Chelz said because there aren't many free-standing, high signs, Aggieville is scaled more for pedestrians than drivers.

"I enjoy the sensitivity that's directed on the Dusty Bookshelf," he said.

Chelz said the way the store subtly creates scenes of books in the windows with minimal signage gives customers more information about what kind of store it is, rather than acting as an advertisement for the store itself.

As he glanced out the front window of Java toward Dusty Bookshelf, Chelz asked "Are we talking about identity and identification or advertising?"

In Aggieville signs, there's a little of both.

tunately only a lull," said Dr. Irvin S.Y. Chen, director of the AIDS Institute at UCLA. "Not all patients are responding as effectively as the majority of patients. There are some patients for whom the drugs are not effective."

And some advocates point out that AIDS patients, as they live longer, will need more help, not less.

"It's still difficult for a person to walk into a doctor's office and be treated for AIDS," Portelli said. "We are concerned that people will misinterpret this news. We would hope to see more money and support for better access to medical services. New drugs are not all we need."

"Access to health care is a life-and-death matter," said Christine Lubinski, deputy executive director of the AIDS Action Council in Washington. "We are going to continue to urge an increased investment because we're finally beginning to see a payoff."

A growing number of people are living with AIDS each year, the CDC said. In June 1996, 223,000 Americans age 13 and older had the disease — a 10-percent jump from mid-1995 and a 65-percent increase from 1993.

As of December 1996, 581,429 Americans had been diagnosed with AIDS since 1981: 488,300 men, 85,500 women and 7,629 children.

And some new trends are worrying health officials. Blacks accounted for more cases of AIDS than whites for the first time in 1996 — 41 percent compared to 38 percent. Hispanics accounted for 19 percent, and other races 2 percent.

was advised not to comment or talk to her. This could have been settled a long time ago if I could have said I was sorry for what I did to offend her."

The court record said the charge of lewd and lascivious behavior implied the defendant would "publicly expose a sex organ or expose a sex organ in the presence of a person, to wit; Rebecca L. Baalman who is not the spouse of the defendant and who did not consent thereto, with the intent to arouse or gratify the sexual desires of the defendant or another."

In a motion to admit evidence, Baalman claims that Avila "on innumerable occasions prior to the incident charged, masturbated in front of his window so that the victim and her roommate, Kate McElroy, could watch him."

Avila said he cooperated with police officers as soon as he was contacted about the incident.

"I never lied to anyone and said I didn't do it," Avila said. "I told the officer I did it. The jury knew I did it. She said I did it, but it became a legal exercise to see how the law interpreted what was public and presence."

Avila said he contested the legal concept of presence extending to include behavior in his private bedroom.

The Riley County jury decided the legal distance determining presence was 90 feet, Avila said.

Avila said both he and Baalman were the recipients of harassing phone calls, random comments and eggs thrown at their residence following the Collegian's initial coverage of his arrest.

"People have told me that this is the paramount definition of who I am, but it shows that people have human pitfalls," Avila said. "This isn't something that defines who I am."

Disapproval about the Collegian's decision to run the initial story resulted in criticism about news judgment and numerous letters to the editor.

Baalman refused to comment on the conviction beyond saying she hoped this situation would soon be over.

"The Collegian can go to hell for what we have gone through," Baalman said.

Support for those involved has been offered by friends as well as total strangers, Avila said.

"I've had an immense support system," Avila said. "They were not supporting me because they thought she was wrong, but because they thought I might need emotional support, and I have appreciated it."

Avila, who has been involved in student government at K-State for the past three years, said he wants to continue to live in Manhattan even after graduation.

"I could have left at any time and transferred, and a few people have advised me to do so," Avila said."My heart is here. This will not affect my career plans or my willingness to work hard and touch the lives of students."

Avila also expressed hope this situation would soon end.

"It's just one reminder of the frailty of humanity," he said. "I want the dust to settle and for this to be over with."

Robert Littrell, attorney at law for Avila, said Avila will be sentenced March 17.

"He pleaded not guilty. It went to trial, and he was found guilty. The maximum sentence, six months in jail and a $1,000 fine, in this situation is not likely," Littrell said. "The probable sentence is some counseling, probation and a fine."

A misdemeanor conviction can be expunged after three years if probation requirements are completed.

Bill Muir, faculty representive, said forcing the Union to cut back services or employees would hinder other improvement efforts.

"Do you want a union to service your needs? Do you want this Union to be at the best?" Muir asked.

He said if Senate passes the bill, it will help the Union be the best possible, and the Union would still break even. He also said if the bill is not passed, the Union will still barely break even, but it will not be operating at its best.

Muir said the original plans three years ago were for a $9 million expansion of the Union. He said now it has become a Union renovation rather than an expansion.

"The cost of living has gone up about 2 percent per year, but the cost of construction has gone up 9 percent per year," Muir said.

Senate passed the K-State Union Repair and Replacement Budget Continuance at just more than $105,000. Senate also allocated money to Amnesty International, International Club and KSU Environmental Professionals for special projects next fall.

most commonly passed from person to person.

That makes the foothold useless to these strains. However, other strains use a different foothold instead, and that might explain the new case, the researchers said.

In fact, it's a mystery that more people with the mutation aren't getting infected by these other strains, said Robert Doms of the University of Pennsylvania, one of the scientists who showed that the mutation is usually protective.

Maybe these other strains aren't very good at infecting people, he said.

In any case, it was just a matter of time before somebody with the mutation was found to be infected, he said.

"It's important this occurred," he said, because researchers didn't want people with the mutation to assume that they were immune to HIV and could stop practicing safe sex. And this proves the point.

Doms said he's heard rumors of two other such cases, one in Paris and another in North America.

would allow Schultz to gain ground on the field of competitors.

"They're both throwing really well, but I think Kirsten can throw further," he said. "Kirsten can get those high marks and each time she is getting better and better."

Fritz said he liked the camaraderie between all of the throwers, and he thought each fueled the other in competition.

"I think it's easier for them to train when they know they are training with some of the best competition in the country," Fritz said. "Their competition has different affects of them, but none of them are intimidated by the competition"

For the most part, Seiler avowed Fritz's statement.

"We do have a great friendship between all of us," Seiler said. "We each push each other, and we want to help each other so much."

While Seiler and Schultz will compete in Atlanta, K-State's other provisional qualifier, Anna Whitham, will go to Iowa.

band opened its set with a funked-up cover of "Voodoo Chile," and Mock's guitar solo in the midst of "006" echoes the semi-obscure "Hey Baby (Land of the New Rising Sun.)"

Dumler credits the street philosopher Idem with the line, "Unity is simpler than a fraction," which he made into a lyric for "Music Makers."

His stage presence was amazing, not so much for its brashness or angst often associated with a less-experienced frontman, for Dumler didn't have much of either. In a plain gray knit sweater and jeans, his goofy swagger between songs and during instrumentals only heightened his effect when it was time for vocals.

Then he'd just let the funk roll. Dumler's lyrics were nearly indecipherable under the instruments, but at least for the show the audience was forgiving. They were content just to drop into a groove and stay a while.

Brandon Fitzsimons, senior in mass communications and guitarist for Manhattan-based Derailer, said he enjoyed the band's set, even though he really isn't into their brand of music.

"The music scene around here is too generic," he said. "It's nice to hear bands try something new. I think if I'd had a few more drinks, I'd have been up there dancing with them."

The band wanted to thank the fans of Manhattan music who brave the rain, literal or otherwise, to see the local shows.

"Every little bit helps," Goheen said. "We're all in this together."

Three ways to beat the high cost of college.
1. The Montgomery GI Bill
2. Student loan repayment
3. Part-time income

The Army Reserve Alternate Training Program is a smart way to pay for college.
First, if you qualify, the Montgomery GI Bill can provide you with up to $7,124 for current college expenses or approved vo/tech training.
Second, if you have—or obtain—a qualified student loan not in default, you may get it paid off at the rate of 15% per year or $500, whichever is greater, up to a maximum of $10,000. Selected military skills can double that maximum.
Third, you can earn part-time money in college, and here's how it works: One summer you take Basic Training, and the next summer you receive skill training at an Army school. You'll earn over $1,500 for Basic and even more for skill training. Then you'll attend monthly meetings at an Army Reserve unit near your college, usually one weekend a month plus two weeks a year. You'll be paid over $107 a weekend to start. It's worth thinking about. Give us a call:

Man found dead at Tuttle Cove

staff writer

Manhattan resident Albert A. Cantrell, 41, of 905 Munich Lane, was found dead in his automobile in the Tuttle Cove Area of Tuttle Creek Lake at 4:31 a.m. Friday.

The apparent cause of death was carbon monoxide poisoning.

The Riley County Police Department is investigating it as a possible suicide.

Cantrell was born in Liberal. He is survived by his wife, Mary J. Volden.

He was employed by Sunflower Electric for 10 years in Liberal.

Most recently, he was employed at Stanion Wholesale Electric for 11 years, and Western Extralite Co., both in Manhattan.

3 people arrested in connection with death of local woman

ASSOCIATED PRESS

A 44-year-old woman was found dead and a 37-year-old man seriously injured when police were called to investigate a shooting at a home.

Police arrested three people in the death of Wanda A. Norman, of Manhattan, Riley County Police Department Capt. Steven French said in a statement.

All three were in custody Saturday on suspicion of felony murder, attempted felony murder, aggravated robbery and aggravated burglary.

Police were called to the home just before 11 p.m. Friday. The injured man, whose identity was not released, was taken to an area hospital.

In custody were a 25-year-old Ogden woman and two men, both 17 from Manhattan.

No other details were available, a Riley County sheriff's dispatcher said.

Tornadoes kill 24 people in Arkansas

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — Nicholas Word was standing on his front porch when the tornado struck, smashing his tiny wood-frame house off its foundation and hurling him and the wreckage into his neighbor's yard.

"When I woke up, there was just rubble — rubble and fog," Word said Sunday amid the devastation of Saturday's killer storms. "All I can tell you is, it's the worst sound that you'd ever want to hear in your life. But I guess I cheated death."

The storms killed at least 24 people in Arkansas, ripping through Little Rock, Arkadelphia and smaller towns nearby.

It seemed like "a year's worth of tornadoes," Gov. Mike Huckabee said Sunday.

There was a possibility the death toll could climb as rescue workers worked in Sunday's driving rain to pull away the wreckage, authorities said.

More than 200 people were injured and hundreds of homes, businesses and other structures were destroyed or damaged along a 260-mile path from Hempstead County in the southwest to Greene County in the state's northeastern corner.

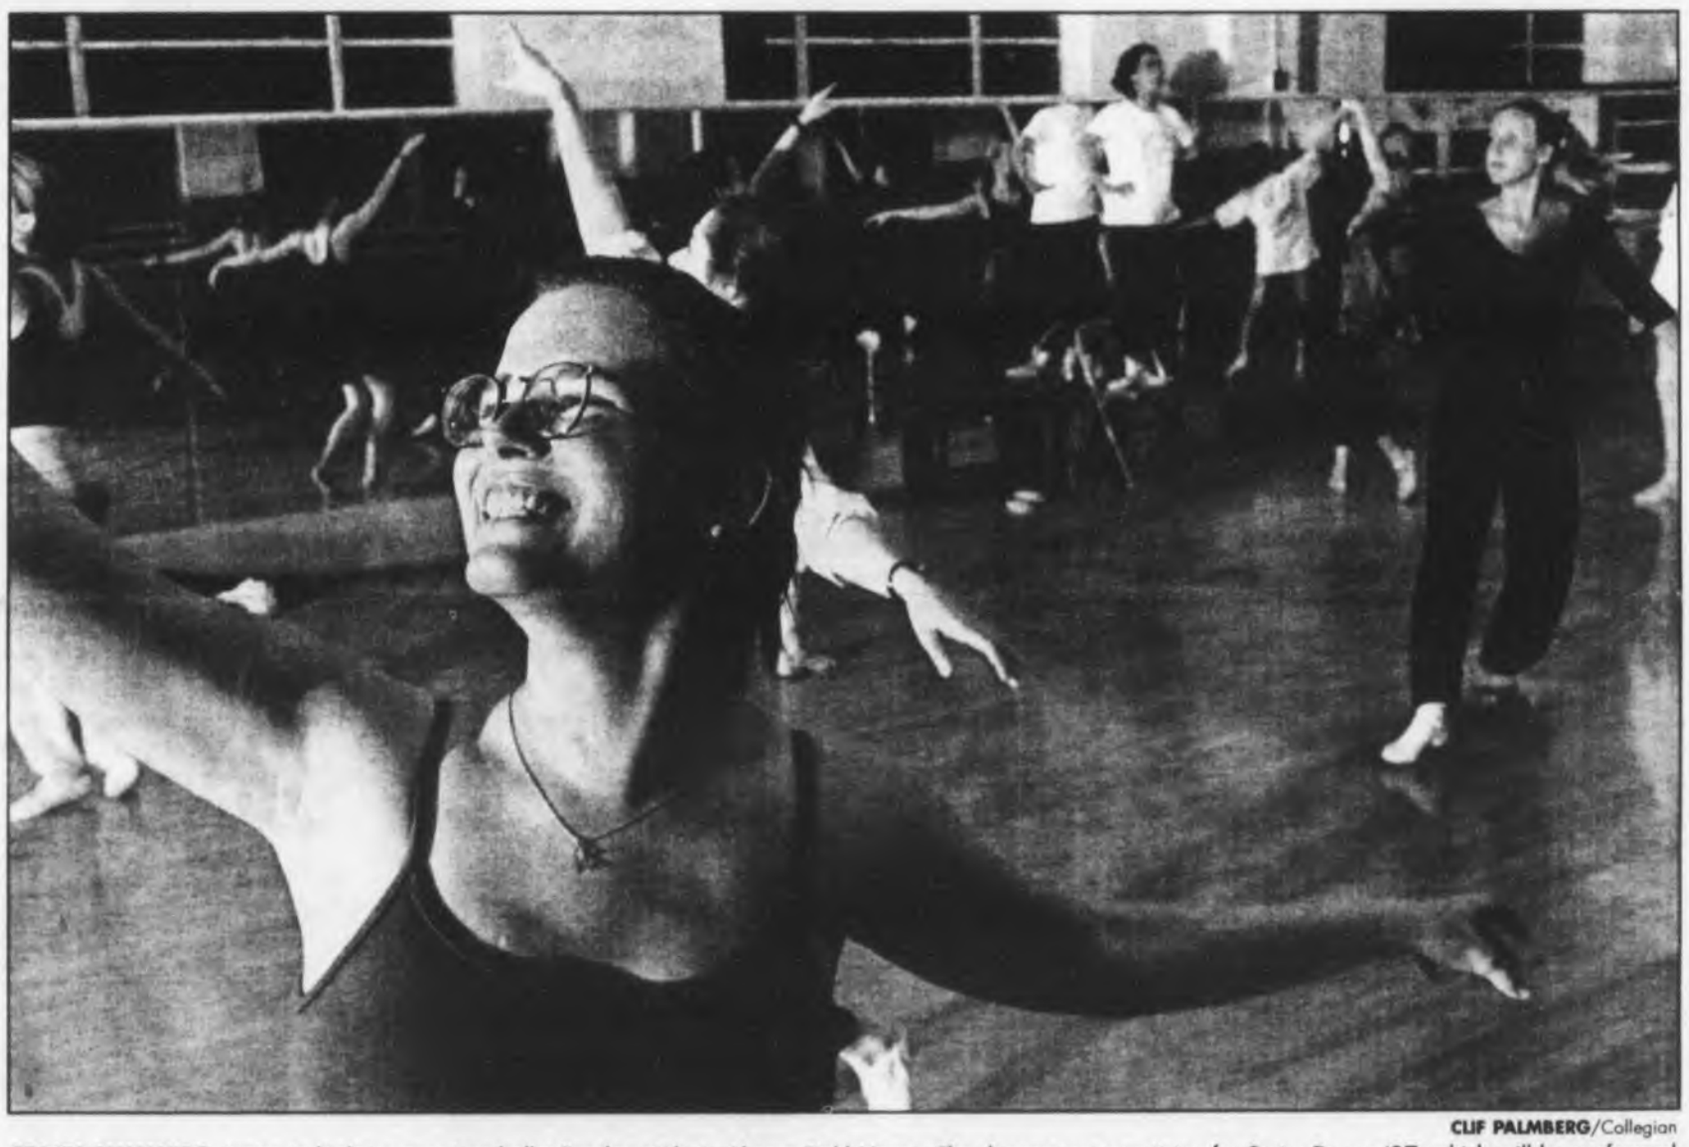
The same huge system of thunderstorms also killed up to seven people in Mississippi, Kentucky, Tennessee and Ohio on Saturday. Flooding forced scores of people from their homes in West Virginia, Kentucky and Ohio.

Huckabee said he would seek a federal disaster declaration covering at least eight Arkansas counties.

"The term I'm using to describe it is 'apocalyptic proportions,'" the governor said after flying over the damage in Little Rock and Arkadelphia. "There is no way to describe the level of damage we have."

Weather specialists had not yet determined if the area was hit by one tornado or several, said Renee Fair, warning coordination meteorologist for the National Weather Service office at North Little Rock.

"I lost my sister in this," Netra King said tearily as she stood in the corner of her own home, still standing in suburban College Station. Her sister, Barbara King, 40, was one of three people confirmed killed in the community southeast of Little Rock.



"Right now, the only thing that we can do is try to get important papers out. That's all that we can do," King said, as she scooped up insurance cards and legal documents drenched by rain.

The hardest-hit area was the Sardis community of Saline County, west of Little Rock, with 10 confirmed dead.

Rescue workers meticulously searched through the twisted debris of a demolished mobile home park in Sardis on Sunday, while many residents returned to what was left of their homes for the first time since the storm.

Jeremy Taylor, 23, crawled on his stomach underneath his overturned mobile home

RICH EXCHANGE

STORY BY TAMARA PETERSON

The cool, crisp air had traveled up the stairs of the Brockman house on the corner of Manhattan Avenue and Thurston Street.

Though it was chilly, the door was open. Open doors during chilly February evenings are not common in Manhattan, but to John Riches, they are a matter of habit.

Riches, a visiting professor, is from Norwich, England, where central air-conditioning is not the norm, and where he teaches graphic design.

Riches said he is both an artist and a designer.

"An artist explores its own interest and develops a language. A designer designs something for someone else," Riches said.

Riches, a senior lecturer at Norwich School of Art and Design, and Teresa Schmidt, assistant professor of art at K-State, traded places for five weeks. Riches taught Drawing I, II and III. Several students from both schools also traded places.

Students at Norwich specialize in practice and theory in art and design. The school offers courses in graphic design, fine art painting, print making, sculpture and fiber arts.

Riches said there are 1,000 students at Norwich, while K-State has about 20,000. Other than the number of students, the students at the two schools are much the same, he said.

During his first week at K-State, Riches observed classes and shared the teaching with Schmidt.

"After the first week I was familiar with the drawing program. I then took over Schmidt's classes," Riches said, adding that his teaching methods and Schmidt's were compatible.

Riches said he has become familiar with the students during his time in Manhattan.

"They were enthusiastic about learning the academic approach to drawing. Students learned about measured drawing and linear perspective drawing," he said.

As a first-time visitor to America, Riches said he has been genuinely excited by the informed K-State students whom he has taught and the fellowship with the arts faculty staff.

"They have been friendly and hospitable, and students have been receptive to my teaching methods," Riches said.

Last Wednesday was Riches' last day of teaching at K-State. He said the K-State students have shown a keen interest in studying at Norwich.

Riches met new people, made new friends and plans to keep in contact with them.

"I'll remember how John Riches was good natured and humorous. Everytime I've seen John, he always had something

Faulkner's attorney to speak at K-State

▶ ATTORNEY WHO HELPED first woman gain entrance into all-male Citadel to give lecture about barriers to gender equity.

RYAN O'HALLORAN
staff reporter

Valorie Vojdik, the attorney who helped Shannon Faulkner sue and gain admittance to the previously all-male Citadel, will present the 1997 Dorothy L. Thompson Civil Rights Lecture Monday night.

Vojdik's lecture will be titled, "Rape of the Lock: Social and Cultural Barriers to Gender Equity."

The lecture will start Monday at 7:30 in the K-State Student Union's Forum Hall.

Vojdik served as lead counsel to Faulkner and other females who filed a suit regarding the admission policy to the Citadel, a state military-style college located in Charleston, S.C.

Vojdik is currently on the New York University School of Law faculty, where she earned her law degree in 1986.

Before she joined the faculty at NYU, Vojdik was an associate at a New York law firm. Among her more high-profile cases were those involving Roman Catholic nuns, who challenged the constitutionality of a zoning ordinance which disallowed them from establishing a group home for homeless single women and their children.

Vojdik also represented handicapped Postal Service employees in a discrimination case they won.

The 1982 Brown University graduate was awarded Pro Bono Attorney of the Year honors in 1993 by the South Carolina American Civil Liberties Union in conjunction with work on the Faulkner case.

Currently, women can attend the school, but recent accusations of harassment of female cadets have forced school and state investigations and a hearing by the U.S. Justice Department.

The Thompson series is in honor of Dorothy L. Thompson, the K-State associate University attorney who died in 1992. Thompson developed K-State's affirmative action policy and the Commission on the Status of Women.

▶ 24 HOURS IN REVIEW

These briefs encapsulate the news of the past 24 hours, and they are from staff reports, wire reports and other news services.

▶ NATION AND WORLD

• SCIENTISTS PRODUCE CLONED MONKEYS FROM EMBRYOS.

WASHINGTON — Scientists in Oregon have produced monkeys from cloned embryos, making the first time a species so closely related to humans has been cloned, the Washington Post reported.

Oregon scientists used a technique similar to the one used by Scottish researchers last week to clone a sheep. Experts say the Oregon success, which has not yet been announced, adds to a growing body of evidence that there are no insurmountable biological barriers to creating multiple copies of a human being.

• GORE WAS 'SOLICITOR-IN-CHIEF' FOR RE-ELECTION CAMPAIGN.

WASHINGTON — Vice President Al Gore played the central role in raising millions of dollars during the buildup to the 1996 election, sometimes using direct solicitations that several Democratic donors said they found heavy-handed and inappropriate, the Washington Post reported.

Gore has established a national fund-raising network that is the most formidable in American politics.

• QUAKE KILLS AT LEAST 500, INJURES 2,000 IN IRAN.

NIR, Iran — Rescue teams fought snow, high winds and wild dogs Saturday as they tried to bring help to an earthquake-devastated region in northwest Iran. Doctors and aid workers said the death toll was in the thousands.

The quake rocked mountainous Ardabil province Friday afternoon, damaging 83 villages — some were razed — and injuring about 2,000 people. It said the official death toll had risen to 500, but rescue and aid workers estimated at least 3,000 people had died.

The Iranian quake was one of a number that have jolted Asian countries over the last couple of days, including temblors in Armenia, China and Pakistan. Scientists said there was no evidence that any of them were connected.

• ROBBERS WOUND 16 OFFICERS, CIVILIANS DURING ESCAPE.

LOS ANGELES — The two bold gunmen killed in the five-block, rolling gunfight that followed their bungled bank robbery had a crushing firepower advantage over the police who stopped them.

Police refused to identify the two robbers, who wounded 16 officers and civilians Friday along their escape route from the Bank of America's North Hollywood branch. Investigators believed they were acting alone.

• TEEN-AGERS OVERDOSE ON MUSCLE RELAXANTS AT DANCE.

WOBURN, Mass. — Teen-agers, gobbling pills by the handful, overdosed on prescription muscle relaxants at a dance meant to keep them off the streets. Thirteen were in hospitals Saturday, 10 in critical condition.

Most of the victims were teen-age girls, ages 13 to 16, celebrating their selection for the cheerleading squad. He said their prognosis was good.

The teens had taken handfuls of the prescription muscle relaxant Baclofen, washing them down with water, soft drinks and beer.

The drug often is used for treating cerebral palsy and multiple sclerosis, normally in doses of one or two pills. Slightly higher doses can lead to euphoria or intoxication and large doses can shut down the lungs and cause death.

• ISRAEL WILL NOT COMPLETE WITHDRAWAL AS PROMISED.

JERUSALEM — Israel will not complete its next troop withdrawal in the West Bank by Friday, the deadline set in an agreement with the Palestinians.

A senior aide to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu conceded there might be logistical delays in completing the pullback.

But Israel radio said Sunday that opposition to the withdrawal from inside the ruling coalition was delaying it.

Diversity is the seed of harmony.

This theme signifies Asian American Awareness Month in March.

Marsha Lobmeyer, sophomore in biology and pre-med, created the idea.

"In musical terms, harmony is not possible without more than one sound or pitch," Lobmeyer said. "Without diversity, you would just have one boring song."

Activities begin today with keynote speaker Elizabeth R. OuYang, staff attorney for the Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund.

Her notable cases include defending Asian Americans in an ongoing voting rights challenge in the 12th Congressional District, populated mainly by Latinos.

Nobuko Miyamoto, singer and actress, will perform her one-woman show, "A Grain of Sand," on March 18.

"For over 20 years, I have been involved in creating work that will help give a holistic vision of Asian Americans and our relationship with the world around us," Miyamoto wrote in a statement.

Members of the Asian American Student Union strive for similar goals.

"The point of Asian American Awareness Month is not to alienate us from everyone," Michelle Yang, freshman in biology said. "It just shows we're from different cultural backgrounds."

Traditional Asian and other cultural dress will be modeled on Saturday at Bombers. AASU is joined by many other organizations in this event titled "House of Vibes." In fashion show format, both traditional and modern clothing will be shown, and a party will follow.

Ria Kim, sophomore in business management and marketing, is co-coordinator of "House of Vibes" with Lobmeyer.

She said AASU wants to expand during this month by promoting diversity on campus and in the community.

"I think K-State is developing a greater appreciation of diversity," Lobmeyer said.

"The seed represents the growth of diversity as well as the potential for harmony," she said of the theme.

"AASU's goal is simply to help water the seed so eventually it can develop and bloom," Lobmeyer said.

All are welcome to attend each event.

State forestry program develops conservation by offering trees

CAMI SOWERS
staff reporter

Those long stretches of trees alongside Kansas' highways are windbreaks. Many of them were planted through the state forestry program in connection with Cooperative Research and Extension at K-State.

The program, which has been around since 1957, is aimed at planting trees for conservation. The only restriction of the program is that the trees are not used for landscaping purposes, state forester Bill Loucks said.

Each spring, trees that are one to two years old and about a foot tall are sold. The size of the trees varies with the species. In Kansas, the trees are planted in all 105 counties, providing windbreaks for homes, fields, livestock or wildlife. They are also planted for Christmas trees, wood lots and erosion control.

"The trees are available to anyone who has a need for conservation planting," Loucks said.

About 4,000 people order trees every spring from this program. Most of the trees are purchased by people in rural areas, but the program can send them to town, Loucks said.

"Anyone who has a need for conservation planting can get these trees," Loucks said.

The survival rate of the trees varies between zero and 100 percent, but the average varies year to year. The experienced growers usually get about 95 percent that survive and first-time growers get considerably less, Loucks said.

There are about 25 types of trees sold by the state-forestry program. They include seven species of shrubs, 11 or 12 deciduous species and six or seven evergreen species.

Bare-root trees are available in units of 50 for $25.75, and trees in containers are available in units of 30 for $42.35. The container trees are available in the fall as well as the spring, but the bare-root trees are only available in the spring.

Bundles of trees are sold for backyard windbreaks and include about 20 trees that attract song birds. Another bundle that is sold is the wildlife bundle. This includes about 130 trees that attract wildlife, and it will cover about half an acre.

in Sardis. "I just want to find a ring, the one my mother gave me for graduation," he said.

Taylor was not home Saturday when a tornado slammed his trailer onto his pickup truck. Rescue workers pulled the body of a girl from the wreckage Saturday. Taylor said he didn't know her.

Debbie Bagley, 24, of Benton, went to check on the home of her parents, who were out of town when the storm hit.

She found pieces of the one-story, wood-frame house strewn over a quarter-mile area near Sardis.

"I heard the storm had hit, and I wanted to check on the dogs. I wasn't suspecting the house to be gone," Bagley said, holding a box of photos, all she could retrieve from the rubble. "I'm just glad (her parents) weren't here. There's no way they could have survived."

witty, up-beat to say to me," Anna Calluori Holcombe, head of the art department, said.

From fellow faculty members, like Holcombe, he has learned a lot about Kansas culture.

"People are very polite, reserved and friendly here in Kansas. Maybe it's because I'm English that people are this way," Riches said.

Riches said his stay here has been busy and productive.

"I have established a firm link with K-State faculty and Norwich School of Art and Design. The remit of exchange included teaching which I have enjoyed. The contact with KSU students has been a real bonus and possibly the most rewarding aspect," Riches said.

The last five weeks of Riches' stay at K-State have allowed him to present his own work as a graphic designer to the K-State arts faculty. Last Monday evening, he showed his research at the Manhattan Center for the Arts.

A GUIDE TO SECTIONS OF THE COLLEGIAN OPINION PAGE

COLUMNS are opinions expressed by the columnists. The opinions are not necessarily the opinions of the Collegian.

Collegian dedicated to giving students complete SGA election coverage

Student Governing Association elections are about to go into warp drive. To provide fair and accurate coverage, we will spend this week exploring the options available to you, the voters.

Student body presidential and vice presidential candidates' columns will run in alphabetical order. Of the six pairs of candidates running for for these positions, only four met the deadline. Their columns will run Tuesday through Friday.

There will also be profiles on the presidential and vice presidential candidates. These will run on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday.

The Collegian will not run profiles on Wednesday because the paper will be a four-color publication and running only one pair of candidates' photographs in color would be biased coverage.

We are running the columns to inform readers about the issues each set of candidates thinks are important. None of the columns are an endorsement for a particular ticket.

However, the Collegian will endorse a presidential ticket later this week. We will conduct interviews to determine which ticket we think would best serve the University.

The Collegian would also like to remind readers there will be an election guide next week. We have prepared questions for students running for president, Senate, the Board of Student Publications and the Union Governing Board.

Candidates who returned our questionnaires before deadline will have their opinions and ideas published in the election guide Monday.

For stories and information related to past SGA elections, check the E-Collegian archives at (http://collegian.ksu.edu/).

• LESS WEATHER SPACE, MORE BULLETINS.

Editor,

My comments concern the space that you choose to allocate to the bulletins dealing with student organizations on campus. You understand that these bulletins are reminders to students involved in these organizations from the people elected to be in charge of the organizations.

Many of the bulletins post changes in meeting times and places and help the students plan and organize their schedules better. My problem occurs when instead of running these bulletins, you cut them in favor of a 4-inch-by-4-inch blip about the weather for the week.

Most students can walk outside and find out the weather. But by simply walking outside you cannot find out a change in the meeting place of your organization.

Would it not benefit the students more to allocate more space to bulletins and less space to the weather?

As well as not running the bulletins in the paper to remind the students involved in the organization, you might be hurting the integrity of the individual responsible for posting the activities.

Everyone, please do not assume that this individual has neglected to plan ahead and place the bulletin soon enough to be run. For instance, if the Executive Council of Alpha Kappa Psi meets on Tuesday nights and the time or place of the meeting changes, by placing the bulletin on Wednesday morning you are not guaranteed that your bulletin will run in the paper Thursday morning.

This is a truly aggravating feeling when you look in the student-run paper directed toward students only to find out the bulletin you needed to have run was passed over for a blip about the weather.

Please ponder these thoughts for a while, maybe at the same time you are outside finding out what the weather is actually doing instead of going by the forecast.

• MORE PEOPLE NEED TO VOLUNTEER FOR BLOODMOBILE

Editor,

As a faculty member for more than 40 years, it was my privilege to participate in numerous campus blood drives both as a donor and as faculty coordinator. Since retirement, I have continued to be involved by representing the Manhattan Kiwanis Club, whose members coordinated the many volunteers who worked during the week the Bloodmobile was on campus.

The Bloodmobile that recently completed its drive on campus yielded 652 units donated by both students and staff. Exit polling indicated that this total represented 2.6 percent of the student body and 2.4 percent of the University staff.

Blood drives in the 1970s at K-State often exceeded the 1,500-unit goals with considerably fewer students. While the need of blood today is even greater with larger population and more sophisticated medical procedures, there is a noticeable reluctance by our current population to give to this great humanitarian cause.

It's something to contemplate.

Columnist discovers that sports aren't for her by

on the diamond, the hardwood, the track ...

MATT HAWKINS/Collegian

Agile I am not.

I have twirled goofily in and out of all sorts of sports teams and programs in search of being one of the sporty girls.

It all began at age 8, when I was on the blue basketball team at the local recreation center.

Socks pulled up to my knees (I thought it's what all basketball players did), hair in braids, double zero emblazoning the back of my jersey, I did my best to play the game. However, I was most commonly seen either guarding someone on my own team or sitting on the sidelines, picking my nose.

I took a year's sabbatical after that arduous first season. When I returned to the sporting world, I did the Michael Jordan-esque thing and turned my talents to baseball.

I took my job out in right field, representing Fausto's Fried Chicken, with pride. Jersey hanging down to my knees, I usually just prayed that no one would whack anything my way. If they did, I would timidly teeter toward the barreling ball, glove covering my face.

But it was in batting where I really stood out. When I stepped up to the plate, the pitcher would turn and motion for everyone to move in. It wasn't until much later that I learned there really weren't two people per base.

In practice, my comrades would yawn impatiently swing after futile swing as I tried to connect with that stupid ball. Finally, the coaches pulled out the batting tee, as if that was going to help me. With the added assistance, I would sometimes putt an anemic grounder in the pitcher's direction. Glorious cheers would erupt, and the next batter would have to be shaken awake to take their turn.

Then there were those school yard games of kick ball, where my kicking was a bit more accurate than my batting was.

Then one fateful day, kick ball changed me forever.

It was my turn to kick. I stood poised, ready to go in for the kill. As the pitcher rolled the ball toward me, the bell rang, signaling the end of recess. I decided to kick the ball anyway. However, I ended up kicking the pitcher, who had run up to pick up the ball. Being the cool kid he was, he punched me a few times in the face. Me, being the bony little squeeb that I was, couldn't do much in the way of self-defense. That's when my big and burly friend Crystal, who recognized my eternal wimpiness, socked the boy for me.

I didn't like kick ball much after that.

The same less-than-heroic athletic pattern continued through middle school, in spite of my efforts to ignore it.

Despite my lackluster basketball career, I decided to participate in the basketball free-throw contest in sixth grade. When I learned that I had advanced to the regional competition, I was quite taken aback. Not because I doubted my superior athletic abilities, but because I wasn't aware that making five out of 25 shots was considered good. It turned out that I was the only girl in the 10-11 age group, and I was begrudgingly awarded the honor by default.

I ignored this slight technicality and marched proudly on to regionals. In a crowded gym in Pratt, I stepped to the line — and proceeded to miss every single shot of the 25.

And it gets worse.

Of course, I fled to the women's restroom in a teary blur. As I sat on the toilet, boo-hooing away, pants around my ankles, a very rotund man opened the stall door and stared blankly at me.

I quickly slammed the door shut again, crying even harder than before.

My athletic hijinx didn't stop there. I tried my uncoordinated hand at about every intramural sport I could during middle school:

- Gymnastics — I got put in the "Group Who Can't Do Cartwheels."
- Swimming — In meets, by the time I had swam one length of the pool, I was in someone else's lane.
- Track—On the first day of practice, people yukked it up at my pigeon-toed, galumphing style of running. I also fell over several hurdles.

Once I got to high school, I figured the only reason for my previous shoddy athletic performances was because I was young and ungangly. So, thinking that somehow my athletic situation was different than in younger days, I joined the freshman basketball team.

During my stint with the team, I never figured out what back door meant, nor could I ever figure out where I was supposed to stand during a free-throw.

I think the coach liked me just because I made her laugh.

During one game, which we were clearly going to win, she and the assistant coach (whom we called Sparky and had a short-long hairstyle, which his wife permed for him), decided to throw me in at the point guard position, one I'd never played before.

As I trotted up and down the court, I would look over to my coaches in desperation, only to see them red with laughter.

My number was retired after that season.

After all of my traumatic sports-related experiences, one might expect to find me rocking back and forth in a dark corner. Sadly enough, when I tried to do that, I fell over and cracked my head.

the lazy idealist's guide to activism

your money is your voice

Sometimes the only way to make the world a better place is by not making it worse.

Sometimes contributing to the world isn't about doing something, so much as it's about not doing other things.

Most of what I consider to be my greatest accomplishments are things I don't do (anymore). I quit smoking. I quit drinking. I quit eating slaughtered animals.

Despite such sacrifices, I usually feel that the suffocatingly tight schedule of academic hopscotch has made me a guilt-ridden inactive activist, attempting to put my conscience on hold until I graduate, which could be a long wait.

Still, the most effective and sometimes the only strategy we can all use to tug at the seam of human injustices is a relatively passive and inevitable choice.

It is about how we spend the money that we have to spend, or in some cases money that we just feel compelled to spend.

In some cases, the right choice is also the expensive choice, but not usually.

If even half our lifelong investments in everything from beer to toilet paper is based on which companies are environmentally safe or which companies don't discriminate based on race, gender or sexual orientation, we are making quite a dent.

Being conscious of the direct control we have as individuals over such injustice is uncomfortable, because it means taking responsibility for our role in regenerating injustice.

When we pay for products that pay for injustice, we support the almighty tradition of supply and demand.

We demand injustice.

We have as much power over these issues as consumers as we do as voters.

Consulting an on-line index called "Shopping for a Better World," I found a reference guide to products and companies that will forever change my shopping list.

For those of us using MCI to call our psychic friends, mothers and phone sex lines, we are writing our checks out to a company that the Communication Workers of America considers to be the most anti-union of the top three telecommunications firms.

Before you light up that Marlboro, consider that an investment in a Phillip-Morris cigarette is money given to non-medical animal testing and to a company infamous for being negligent of the environment and providing poor family benefits to its employees.

Those attached to their microwave dinners might check their labels to ensure they aren't supporting Tyson Foods. The company, rated in the 10 worst, is listed on the AFL-CIO's national boycott list of employers with unfair labor prices, and in 1989, the company took over a farm that forced many small farmers out of business.

In addition to a list of lawsuits based on the company's anti-union activities, it appears to be slow to embrace Equal Employment Opportunity.

Another company with a similar status is Texaco Inc., which has been listed on America's Worst Environmental Performers by the Council of Economic Priorities for its involvement in a series of oil spills and the effect of its 20-year-old operations in the Amazon, not to mention its substantial use of animal testing.

Texaco was also sued in 1992 for $6 million, in the largest sex discrimination suit ever, which is still under appeal, and few minorities or women have had much of a future with the company.

If you've been running for the border, you should know that Taco Bell, as well as Pizza Hut and Kentucky Fried Chicken, Pepsi and Mountain Dew, are all owned by PepsiCo Inc. which participates in non-medical animal testing.

Other companies that use animals for testing are Dow Chemical Co., which owns Handi-Wrap, Saran Wrap and Ziploc, and Mobil Corp., which owns Hefty and Cinch Sak.

Companies listed as being the 10 least of all evils in all or most social issues include Aveda Corp., Avon Products Inc., the Kellogg Company, Levi Strauss & Co., Johnson & Johnson, Hewlett Packard Co. and Ben and Jerry's Homemade Inc.

Especially of interest to students might be that Anheuser-Busch, as well as Colgate-Palmolive, which owns the Adolph Coors Company, are on the 10 best companies.

To make sure your next meal isn't at the expense of another, you can check it out at (http://www.accesspt.com/Cep/Jsearch.html).

It is not about being politically correct. It is about being socially responsible.

McVeigh's lawyer says he might know how newspaper got document

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — Timothy McVeigh's lawyer said on Sunday he thinks he knows how the Dallas Morning News got what it said was a defense document in which McVeigh admits he was responsible for the Oklahoma City bombing.

The newspaper cited a memo that said McVeigh admits driving the explosives-laden truck that demolished the Oklahoma City federal building in April 1995, and choosing a daytime attack to boost the body count.

"I don't know everything that the Dallas Morning News knows, but this is not a legitimate defense memorandum, and I don't know exactly how they obtained it," lawyer Stephen Jones told ABC's "This Week."

"But I have a pretty good idea this morning, and we will be going to the court (Monday) to inform the judge of what we know," he said.

McVeigh's trial, scheduled to begin March 31, was moved from Oklahoma City to Denver because of pretrial publicity.

Jones said he cannot say whether the news report is true because of U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch's gag order and his own code of professional responsibility. He also said the newspaper refused to give him a copy of the memorandum.

"So the only way that I can tell you an answer to that question is to say, 'One, Mr. McVeigh has pled not guilty, and two, the defense will not present a false defense,'" Jones said.

Jones had threatened to have the trial moved to Alaska or Hawaii.

He said Sunday that he hasn't asked for a change of venue, but conceded the trial might have to be delayed.

Jones previously said his team talked with McVeigh about the report, and McVeigh responded, "There's a practical joker every week."

Legal experts and journalists continue to wrangle about the propriety of publishing the story.

Morning News editor Ralph Langer defended the newspaper's decision. He said the paper's top editors debated at length about what to do with the story and decided it needed to be published.

But Larry Pozner, vice president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, said "What the story says is, 'We don't care about the fundamental rights of anyone if we have a story.'"

Pozner noted that the conversation, if it took place, is protected by attorney-client privilege and is inadmissible in court.

As for the memorandum itself, Pozner said, "The only way you could have it, if it exists, is through a violation of some other citizen's rights."

Sam Archibald, a retired professor of journalism at the University of Colorado who specializes in First Amendment issues, said the newspaper was obliged to print the story.

"If an editor decides the documents are valid he or she should publish it," Archibald said. "Editors are not in the business of withholding information. They are in the business of publishing.

"This is information that people — some of whom will be jurors and all of whom will be participants in a democratic society — have an interest in."

Christopher Mueller, a Colorado University law professor specializing in legal procedures and evidence, disagreed.

"The media should not have published this material at all," he said. "It is just wrong to say there is a public right to know the content of statements of a person in conversation with his lawyer."

Jim Carrigan, a retired federal judge, said it was unethical to publish the story. "This kind of conduct qualifies journalists for a place below lawyers in terms of public respect, in terms of ethics," he said.

O'KEEFFE'S "DARK MESA"

First solo show debuts at Beach art museum

REVIEW BY RUSSELL FORTMEYER

To lovers of artist Georgia O'Keeffe's flowing, voluptuous paintings of flowers, a new show of early watercolors may come as quite a surprise.

"Canyon Suite: Early Watercolors by Georgia O'Keeffe" opened Saturday at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

The show marks the first time the museum will present a solo show of a major 20th-century American artist.

The 28 watercolors in the show are works O'Keeffe (1887-1986) made during 1916 and 1917, while she taught art in Canyon, Texas. The little-known portfolio turned up at the Gerald Peters Gallery in Santa Fe, N.M. in 1987. Eventually, it was purchased by the Kemper Foundations of Kansas City, and Bebe and Crosby Kemper.

The Kempers and United Missouri Bancshares made possible the education wing of the Beach art museum. The O'Keeffe show is also underwritten by Kemper.

For art historians and O'Keeffe fans, the new discovery has been heralded as a rare chance to understand an artist better.

Bill North, curator at the Beach art museum, said the work represents a very important aspect of 20th-century American art.

"They have shed considerable light on her career," North said. "They represent some of the earliest examples of abstraction in 20th-century American art."

Having the entire portfolio together for inspection is also remarkable.

"A lot of its power relies on all of these works being seen together as a group," North said.

Although the suite consists of watercolors, there is a variety of subjects: landscapes, figures and architectural studies.

In a work such as "Sunset," the mountainous landscape is a few lines of dark blue and purple overcast by an explosive sky of fiery reds and yellows with the encroaching midnight blue of evening.

The work measures 11 1/2 by 8 inches and yet perfectly evokes a Southwestern sunset in all its expansive and inspiring splendor.

The watercolors are delightfully simple, being abstracted reductions of the landscape, while also keeping all the necessary profound elements.

Seeing O'Keeffe's early visions of nature, it's clear how the work anticipates the minimalist and color-field artists of the 1960s and 1970s.

Gerald Peters, who represented O'Keeffe at his Santa Fe gallery from 1976 to her death in 1986, had never heard her mention the portfolio, and was not aware of its existence.

"It's one of the greatest discoveries of 20th-century art that has happened," Peters said on Friday. "It is the lexicon of her whole visual language."

In the original catalog for the Peters Gallery show, O'Keeffe said of her experiences at Canyon "I was alone and free — so very free." So the Canyon works can almost be treated as wholly of the artist's vision, relying on little artistic influence from others.

What may be most apparent is how these 28 small works on paper evoke a vastness that is almost wholly identified with the American Southwest.

North said it is hard to answer how O'Keeffe achieved this sense of vastness, but the scale gives the work an intimacy and approachability.

"There's also a real honesty and fidelity to her personal vision," he said. "These are clearly, in my mind, paintings she was painting for herself. It's somewhat telling that these were not known — that the public was not aware of these."

O'Keeffe was an artist not always embraced by the New York art establishment, sometimes because of the unconventional choice of never living in the vaunted art capital.

North said it is hard to imagine what her work would have looked like had she lived in New York, as opposed to living in the Southwest she so admired.

"There's also something about the vastness and isolation of that landscape that attracted her," he said.

▶ The exhibition. "Georgia O'Keeffe: Canyon Suite" is at the Beach Art Museum until April 27. Museum hours are 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Tuesday through Friday and 1 p.m. to 4:30 p.m. Saturday and Sunday. Admission is free. Call 532-7718 for more information.

▶ AURASCOPE BY C. ERA SAILER

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) No matter how clear things seem, don't do anything drastic. Your transition will be much smoother if you try to let it unfold naturally. Just settle into the station until the next ride comes. You're not in a hurry. You may think you are, and short-term solutions will only mature into long-term problems.

ARIES (March 21-April 20) Stop selling yourself short. Your noble willingness to compromise may actually be your inner martyr setting yourself up for disappointment and resentment. You've been underestimating your contributions, enabling others to exploit your work. Don't be afraid to ask for what you deserve.

TAURUS (April 21-May 21) Keep your distance from disgruntled colleagues. Your immediate social climate is lacking patience, so you won't be able to get away with as much. Watch that you don't over-stay your welcome and sit out any potential power matches this week, or face a messy grid lock.

GEMINI (May 22-June 21) Got a little free time? Check in on an old friend that might need grounding. You will be a vital source of comfort and stability to virtually everyone you encounter this week. Pay a little closer attention to what others need. You may be it, and you have a lot more to learn about yourself through giving.

CANCER (June 22-July 23) Seek unity as the cure for some paranoia that is making you feel threatened and competitive. Otherwise you will find yourself in isolation. Women, surround yourself with feminine influences. You don't need to leave town or get laid, you just need to laugh a little. Tape all your favorite sitcoms and watch them back to back.

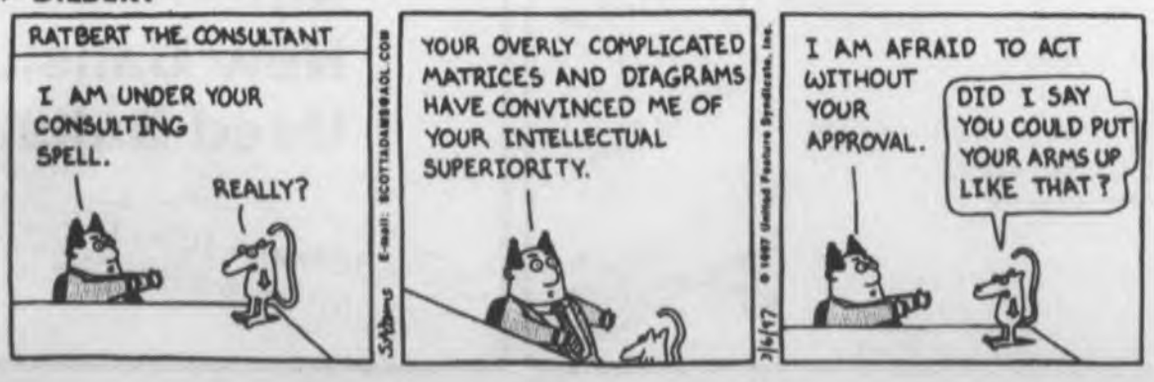
LEO (July 24-Aug. 23) Somebody's got it bad for you in a way that offers the dimension to lust you've been craving. Your advice is valuable, and serves as an affectionate compassion and inadvertent mating call. Consider two concepts; when in Rome, and why ask why.

VIRGO (Aug. 24-Sept. 23) Be especially conscious of where you shed your financial coat. Be willing to go out on a limb for an underdog you believe in, and reject conformity in all of your decisions. Others really need the benefit of your critical instinct this week, whether they want it or not, so speak up.

LIBRA (September 24-Oct. 23) Cooperation is foremost this week. You're voice has been heard and noted. Now is the time to kick back, and let others do their thing. You may need to double up on your workout if your patience is running thin. You may have to rethink your definition of fun. If you can track down a trampoline, strip down to your boxers and fly.

SCORPIO (Oct. 24-Nov. 22) Feeling an urgency to organize your world? Don't waste this rare appetite for order. Don't resort to color-coordinating your sock drawer. Try applying it to something even remotely productive, but don't neglect the important things, like standing on your head and trying to count the stars.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 23-Dec. 22) Your covert and unchallenged capacity for judgment has backfired, and forced witnesses to judge you. You are in for a long week, dodging the repercussions of a bad dip into the dogma of your ego. There are a lot of people who want to support you, and you're making it difficult. Spend time with furry creatures that don't bite.



HOROSCOPES

CAPRICORN (Dec. 23-Jan 20) The more you think about it, the bigger it is going to get. Jump in and take the initiative in new opportunities, no matter how risky it seems. Avoid doing things that make sense, and try to be patient with a troubled loved one that may be quite an element of turbulence for a while. Try to recognize a cry for help no matter how vicious the cry sounds.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 21-Feb. 19) If the shoe fits, buy stock in the company. If your present routine seems to be clashing with an invitation from a tour guide through temptation, you may be forced to re-evaluate what you really want from what is familiar and seems safe.

But don't just exchange old problems for shiny new ones. Just substituting the players won't change the game.

NOT EVEN GOD IS SPARED FROM JUNK MAIL

TAMPA, Florida — If you're looking for God, Sumter County, Florida, might be a good place to start. At least that's what the folks at American Family Publishers seem to think.

The company mailed a sweepstakes notice addressed to "God" to a church in Bushnell, about 60 miles north of Tampa. The message: "God" is a finalist for the $11 million top prize," American Family wrote in the letter received by the Bushnell Assembly of God. If God were to win, the letter stated, "What an incredible fortune there would be for God! Could you imagine the looks you'd get from your neighbors? But don't just sit there, God."

Church pastor Bill Brack is considering mailing in the entry; his congregation could use the money. "I'm willing for them to show up here at the church with cameras and me in my bathrobe as long as they write a check."

ROYALS' PITCHER WILL MISS NEXT SEASON WITH ELBOW INJURY

▶ Kansas City Royal's pitcher Doug Linton, the Royals' fifth starter last year until he injured his elbow, needs surgery on the elbow and expects to miss the 1997 season. Jack-of-all-trades warrants best is yet to come in college basketball

VIEWPOINT

TODD STEWART

TODD STEWART is a junior in secondary education/English. You can e-mail comments to Todd at (toddvs@ksu.edu).

OK, let us continue the saga of America's Angriest White Male.

Let's keep K-State's win over Missouri in perspective. The Wildcats are still the No. 12 seed in the tournament and will still lose in round one. Saturday's game only showed fans two things: Missouri has fallen almost as far as K-State, and Jason Sutherland is not a bright man.

But we'll give a shout out to K-State's lone senior, Gerald Eaker. It was good to see him go out with a win. One block in the tournament and Eaker will be the K-State record holder for career blocked shots.

Can that be right?

●Kansas City Star columnist, Jason Whitlock, was a noticeable no-show at Saturday's game.

Whitlock took a few shots at me in his Friday column and has accused me of destroying his credibility in Manhattan. He also has asked me for an apology to K-State superstar Manny Dies.

But Jason, my friend, you best check yourself.

I was so looking forward to our meeting, but you failed to step up to the plate and face the music.

As for destroying your credibility, don't pass the buck my way. Your credibility had long been gone before I arrived on the scene.

As for Dies, he has played his best basketball of late.

He was one rebound short of a double-double on Saturday and his K-State career has been rejuvenated.

I believe in giving credit where credit is due, and I feel that I am a source of Dies' greatness.

Before my infamous piece, Dies was the worst thing to hit K-State basketball since Dana Altman.

Am I the genius behind his latest tear? I mad Dies who he is.

I pointed out his shortcomings, and he responded.

● Let's also give our props to guard Aaron Swartzendruber. His 12-for-12 free-throw performance down the stretch in Saturday's game was a thing of beauty.

In an era of basketball that emphasizes high-flying, trash-talking, bitch-and-moan performances, it was refreshing to see that the fundamentals are still there.

He proved to K-State fans he is more than just a pretty little point guard.

He has the skills to pay the bills.

● Student elections are upon us here at K-State, and it proves that anything is possible.

I was informed the other day that someone is posting campaign fliers that somehow tried to benefit from my recent popularity.

Two days before the filing deadline, I sat in my room with an application and contemplated running for student body president.

I weighed the pros and cons, before deciding to let some poor sap take the office off my hands. After all, I can't do everything.

● But I might try some new arenas.

I was informed the other day by an employee at KSDB-FM 91.9 that the station is looking for a new sports director, when it clicked in my head: This is for me.

I need a talk show. You give me two turntables and a microphone, and I will tear it up.

You won't find a more educated source in this University, and I need to start firming up the notion that I am a man of all media.

As soon as I figure out what I have to do to apply for this job, I will be there.

You get sports editor Jeremy Kelley in there and all hell would break loose.

He's the disc jockey. I'm the rapper.

● I also found out yesterday that someone has started the official Todd Stewart homepage.

As soon as it is up and running, I'll run the address in print for all to enjoy.

Like I said, I am a man of all media.

● FYI: Keep your eyes on the Collegian for the next few weeks. In a couple weeks I will do something to put Manhattan on the map.

It will be huge. We're taking this thing national.

I will do the unthinkable.

But then again, isn't that what I have been doing all along?

Cats fall on road at Baylor, finish conference in 5th place

SUN DEE MILLS
sports writer

The K-State women's basketball team has struggled on the road all season and dropped its last conference game in Waco, Texas, Saturday night against the Baylor Bears, 81-76.

"We didn't defend well, and that was the difference in the game," Coach Deb Patterson said.

Poor defense contributed to the Bears' success from the field. They shot 56 percent in the first half and 51 percent for the game.

"I felt as though Baylor really assumed an aggressive position on the offensive end of the floor," Patterson said.

Baylor guards Nicole Palmer and Toya Ellis posted 15 points each, and guard Amy Alcala pulled down seven boards.

"They hurt us every which way," Patterson said. "Their kids really stepped up on the offensive end."

The Cats committed a season-high 31 fouls, resulting in 26 Baylor free throws. The two teams shot a combined 69 charity shots.

"You can't win games giving up 26 points at the foul line," Patterson said.

Freshman center Angie Finkes led the Cats with a career-high 20 points.

Senior forward Andria Jones scored 18 points and grabbed 10 rebounds in her sixth double-double of the season.

Jones' numbers for the season did not go unnoticed. She was named first team all-Big 12 Conference on Sunday.

Jones led the Cats in scoring with 19.1 points per game and pulled down an average 7.3 rebounds a game. She posted double figures in scoring 24 of 26 games.

Jones joins Kansas guard Tamecka Dixon, Texas Tech center Alicia Thompson, Nebraska forward Anna DeForge and Iowa State forward Jayme Olsen on the all-Big 12 team. Dixon is the only other senior.

"If you look at the people accompanying me on the first team, they are all great players," Jones said. "It's an honor to be on the team with them. Tamecka Dixon is a great player, and we'll be seeing her name in the women's professional league in years to come."

Patterson said she could see Jones in the pros as well.

"I think A.J. can earn a spot in the WNBA or ABL," Patterson said. "She has the capacity to shoot the three, she can put the ball on the floor, and she can score in the paint. She's also a quick defender."

Senior guard/forward Missy Decker, who averages 8.6 points per game, was named honorable mention Big 12.

She was the only other Cat to earn conference honors.

The Cats finish the season at 16-10 overall and 9-7 in the Big 12.

They travel to Kansas City to take on the Oklahoma Sooners at 2:20 p.m. Tuesday at Municipal Auditorium in the first round of the Big 12 Tournament.

▶ K-State wins senior-day game after late spurt from free-throw line

TODD STEWART
sports writer

If there is a fine line between winning and losing, Saturday provided the perfect example.

That fine line was the charity stripe, as K-State hit 16 free throws in the final 2-1/2 minutes to put away Missouri, 76-60, in both team's Big 12 regular-season finale.

This was a sharp contrast to the earlier meeting between these two teams, as the Tigers were able to do in K-State 85-63 on Feb. 1, hitting a Big 12 conference game record 30 of 32 free throws.

K-State coach Tom Asbury said his team was not going to let that happen again.

"We made a concerted effort not to let them get to the foul line," Asbury said. "The foul line was where we won the game. They put us on the line, and they put the right guy on the line."

That right guy was guard Aaron Swartzendruber, who hit 12 straight free throws down the stretch to seal the win.

But for Swartzendruber and the Wildcats, the day did not start off as successful.

The Cats shot a dismal 31 percent from the field in the first half, aiding the Cats to a less-than-stellar 23-point first half.

Helping that statistic out was a 0-for-13 stretch late in the first half that allowed Missouri to trim the Cats' lead to 19-18, but Missouri's own problems from the field helped the Cats rebound and take a 23-20 lead into the locker room.

At halftime neither team was shooting above 32 percent from the field.

Despite the poor shooting, Asbury said he was pleased with his team's shot selection.

"We had great shots in the first half. They were not contested," Asbury said. "We just missed."

Fortunately for the Cats, that improved in the second half.

Behind the hot second-half performances of guard Ayome May and forward Manny Dies, the Cats improved to 46-percent shooting in the second half before putting the Tigers away at the foul line.

Most of this was compliments of Missouri guard Jason Sutherland.

Swartzendruber sharp in final minutes at charity stripe

SHANE MCCORMICK
sports writer

At the end of last season, K-State coach Tom Asbury told guard Aaron Swartzendruber that guards had to hit free throws at the end of the game.

Swartzendruber took the message to heart, hitting 12 free-throws in the final three minutes of a 76-60 win over Missouri.

Swartzendruber finished the game with a team-high 18 points. He recorded 16 of those points in the second half.

"They just ended up putting the right guy for us at the free-throw line," Asbury said. "We won the game at the free-throw line today."

Swartzendruber struggled in the first half, hitting one of five shots from the field and missing on all three of his attempts beyond the arc.

Swartzendruber continued to struggle from the field in the second half, missing on two jump shots and a three-pointer. For the game, Swartzendruber was only one of seven from the three-point line.

Swartzendruber

Although he hit only one three-pointer, it was a key shot for the Cats.

The Tigers pulled to within three at the 4:46 mark of the second half off of two Kelly Thames free throws.

On the following possession, Cats forward Manny Dies got the ball to Swartzendruber, who drained a three-pointer. The shot put the Cats up six, 56-50.

"That three-pointer was a big play, it was a huge shot," Asbury said. "Aaron ... you gotta love him. He's struggled all year with his shot but he hit that one on the gut."

Swartzendruber said the shot seemed to give the Cats the extra lift they needed.

"It was a pretty big shot, especially since we have had trouble hitting the big shots all year," he said. "It really put the momentum back on our side."

If there was any momentum left in the Tigers, it was drained at the 2:22 mark. On the play, Swartzendruber was fouled by Tiger guard Jason Sutherland. Sutherland disagreed with the referees and drew a technical foul.

Swartzendruber nailed all four free throws and Ayome May hit another on the following possession. The series of play provided the Cats with their biggest lead of the game, 65-53.

Tiger coach Norm Stewart wasn't pleased with the technical foul that was called.

"I can't comment on the officiating, no matter how terrible it was," Stewart said.

Although some Cat players down-played the significance of the technical foul, Asbury said it definitely was a key to the game.

"It is a pretty significant play, Aaron hits all four free throws, and we get the ball on the following possession," Asbury said. "I would have been pretty upset if I was on the other end of that play, it could have been the key to the game."

Swartzendruber's 13 successful free throws fell one short of the school record, held by Elliot Hatcher.

For Swartzendruber, it is his mind set he concentrates on when at the charity stripe.

"I just go to the line, thinking I am going to make every free throw," he said. "I just have a lot of confidence in myself at the free-throw line."

Missouri too much for K-State in 3 game homestand

BRIAN SMOLLER
staff reporter

The basketball team did what the K-State baseball team could not accomplish the entire weekend — beat the Missouri Tigers.

Sunday the Wildcats dropped a 9-7 decision to the Tigers in the last game of the first Big 12 series of the season for K-State.

The win gave Missouri a three-game sweep of the series and a 7-5 record overall and a 3-0 record in the Big 12. K-State fell to 5-4 on the season, 0-3 in the Big 12.

Chris Traylor got the start for the Wildcats, going six innings, allowing four earned runs on four hits, while also striking out one and walking three.

"He pitched well," Coach Mike Clark said. "He got us into the sixth or seventh inning and that's what we want our starters to do."

Traylor cruised early on, shutting out the Tigers through four innings, allowing only two hits.

He ran into trouble in the fifth, however. After walking the lead off batter B.J. Windhorst, Tiger right fielder Ryan Fry crushed a two-out, three-run home run to tie the game. Windhorst chased Traylor in the seventh with a lead-off home run to left field.

"The home runs were close pitches," Clark said. "He looked good."

The Cats jumped out early to a two-run lead when shortstop Heath Schesser spanked a two-run home run in the first inning. The home run came on the first pitch thrown by the Tiger pitcher, Jay Bell.

The home run was his second in as many games and increased his team leading total to four.

The seventh inning is where the lead disappeared for the Cats.

Traylor was lifted in the seventh in favor of Brian Thompson. Thompson promptly walked the bases loaded and was taken out of the game. Pat Hertzel got the tough assignment of trying to get out of the inning without too much damage.

A throwing error by second baseman Todd Fereday cost the Wildcats a chance at a double play as the Tigers went on to score six runs to stake a 9-3 lead.

"It hurt, but you have to remember that we walked five guys before that." Clark said. "We did nothing to help ourselves."

The Wildcats offered a bit of a rally in the bottom half of the seventh, scoring four runs on a pair of two-run home runs by Brian Bobier and Scott Poepard.

The Cats came close in the ninth as well, loading the bases with one out, but they couldn't capitalize.

The Tigers won Friday's contest 11-8, after surviving a late-inning rally by the Wildcats. Jon Oiseth got the loss for the Cats, dropping him to 0-1 on the young season.

Missouri's third baseman Griffin Moore had a grand slam, boosting the Tigers to the victory. Jason Bichelmeyer and Yancy Ayres each added a home run for the Cats.

Saturday's game saw the Cats again fall short, 15-14. Casey Cook absorbed the loss for K-State, evening his record at 1-1.

Schesser went three for five with a home run, and Ayres got three-quarters of the cycle with a single, double and a triple. But the Cats couldn't overcome the Missouri pitchers.

"The good news is that we could've won all three," Clark said. "The heart's there. The determination is there. We just couldn't pull it out."

Clark pointed out Saturday's game as one that got away from the Cats.

"We should have won on Saturday," he said. "Walks were the keys to big innings. Good teams take advantage of that."

K-State remains at home for its next game Tuesday against University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee. The first pitch is slated to be thrown at noon.

Women's tennis team drops 4 matches in conference debut

SHANE MCCORMICK
sports writer

The K-State women's tennis team lost for the first time in four matches, falling to Texas Tech 5-4 Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

In their Big 12 Conference debut, the Cats dropped four of six singles matches. Three of those losses came at the top three spots.

At No. 1 singles, sophomore Yana Dorodnova fell to Erika Fisher 4-6, 6-3, 4-6. It was the third straight dual that Dorodnova fell into a three-set match.

"It is something that isn't new, we have tried to deal with it," Cat coach Steve Bietau said. "She is struggling with mental consistency, she isn't keeping the pressure on herself and playing complete points. She's not playing with a lot of confidence now."

The loss dropped Dorodnova to 4-2 on the season.

Also dropping to 4-2 on the season was junior Lena Piliptchak, who fell to Eva Eguiguren at the No. 2 spot. Piliptchak fell in straight sets, 6-4, 6-3.

"Lena didn't play too well but a lot of that was due to the quality of her opponent," Bietau said. "Eguiguren had a few more weapons than Lena's previous opponents."

Junior Dinah Watson also fell, losing to Amanda Earhart, 6-4, 6-2 at the No. 3 singles spot.

The Cats picked up their first point of the match at No. 4 singles, where Karen Nicholson won in straight sets. Nicholson jumped out to 5-1 leads in both sets with Lakshmi Ravindra before cruising to a 6-4, 6-3 win.

"Karen had been playing good tennis in practice, she just brought that good play with her into her singles matches," Bietau said.

The only other win in singles came at the No. 6 spot, where freshman Aisha Butt beat Carrie Helbing 6-4, 6-0. Butt fell behind 4-0 in the first set, then she proceeded to run off 12 straight games to seal the win. The victory improved Butt's record to 4-2 on the season.

In doubles action, Dorodnova and Piliptchak continued their successful spring campaign, posting an 8-0 win. The victory over Fisher and Ravindra improved the duo's record to 5-1.

Also picking up a win was Watson and junior Chris Schulte. The duo served up a 8-1 win over Misty Meyer and Christine Van Regenmorter. The win boosted Schulte and Watson's record to 3-0 on the season.

Butt and Nicholson fell to Earhart and Eguiguren at No. 2 doubles, 8-1.

"Today, I was pretty happy with the play of our doubles teams," Bietau said. "Texas Tech's strongest doubles team was at the No. 2 spot."

After being whistled for his third personal foul at the 2:22 mark, Sutherland had some words for an official. As Swartzendruber walked toward the foul line, Sutherland was whistled again, this time for a technical foul.

Swartzendruber connected on all four of the ensuing free throws and, on the next possession, Sutherland was called for a block on May, and he was gone.

Three fouls in a span on 18 seconds, and K-State never looked back.

"It was a four-point swing," Swartzendruber said. "It's a competitive game, and sometimes things like that happen."

Swartzendruber led four Cats in double figures with 18 points. Dies added 13, forward Mark Young had 12, and May notched 11.

The win upped the Cats' record to 10-16, 3-13 in conference, while the Tigers fell to 13-16, and 5-11 in conference.

And even though the Cats had already sealed up the No. 12 seed in the Big 12 Tournament, K-State senior Gerald Eaker said it was nonetheless important.

"I think we've got some good momentum going into the tournament," Eaker said.

Swartzendruber echoed Eaker's sentiments.

"We feel like we could be a dangerous team in the tournament," Swartzendruber said. "They'll definitely know we're there to play."

REC REPORT

March 1997

This is a Paid Advertisement

Tune in to our full page ad on the 1st day of each month for program information and monthly calendar of Recreational Services events!

WHO'S who at the REC

Clint Hafliger, senior in food science, is from WaKeeney, Kansas. Between playing intramural football, softball, officiating and becoming an intramural supervisor, Clint has played an active role in the intramural program for more than five years. Clint was an intramural official for two years prior to receiving his job as intramural supervisor. He was approached by the professional staff and the other supervisors for a position because of the camaraderie he had built with the current supervisors. Being a supervisor has taught Clint responsibility and how to deal with people. After graduation this May, he would like to get a job in his major area or attend grad school for a degree in sports administration.

Lifeguard and water aerobic instructor Shelley McCarthy has been working at the pool for four years. She is a senior in kinesiology from Wichita, Kansas. Shelley was introduced to the Rec by a friend who worked at the pool, so she decided to do the same. She has continued to guard because she enjoys the pool atmosphere, the individuals she works with and the patrons. Shelley not only enjoys her job in the water, but also uses it as a place to exercise. She said that swimming laps is a great overall cardiovascular workout and it adds variety so she doesn't become bored. After graduation, Shelley will be completing an internship in corporate wellness and then attending grad school.

Heath Brady, senior in management information systems, said an advantage to his job as a weight and fitness supervisor is being able to see people get in shape and excited about fitness. Another advantage is being able to see the change and progress in Rec users that others don't get to see. Heath, from Albert, Kansas, began working at the Rec two years ago. Since he is graduating this May, Heath only works 6-9 hours a week. After graduation, he will be working in Wichita at Koch Industries as a systems analyst.

my FAVORITE workout

When Donna Rogers was growing up, there were few opportunities for women to participate in sports. But things are different today and Donna takes full advantage of the changes in attitude about women and sports. Donna, both an office assistant in extension agriculture economics and part-time student in journalism, has been an avid racquetball player for more than 20 years. In spite of her busy schedule, Donna finds time to play racquetball at the Rec twice a week after work and would play more often were it not for her 42-mile commute from Frankfort, KS. Donna enjoys competition and will be traveling to Tuscon, AZ, in May to compete in the National Senior Olympics, which she qualified for last fall.

You Asked It!

It would be nice if the Rec Complex provided bows and arrows to go with the archery targets. Would it be possible to have some for check out?

Thanks for the suggestion. Several years ago, we provided bows and arrows. However, it was determined to be a liability to continue to check that type of equipment out. We do have archery targets for checkout, but it is up to each individual to procure their own bows and arrows. Thanks.

POOL ACTION

Swimmers exercise to a different beat. Your heart is a built-in monitor for aerobic exercise. Maintaining your training heart rate for 30 minutes, three times per week increases oxygen demand, burns fat and improves cardiovascular endurance. To find your training heart rate (THR), subtract your age from 220 (maximum heart rate) and multiply by 75. However, if swimming is your means of aerobic exercise, you must subtract the average 13 beats per minute difference there is between swimmers and runners. Subtract your age plus 13 from 220 and multiply by 75. A swimmer's heart rate may be lower because of the body's horizontal position, the cooling effect of the water, or the heart not having to work as hard against gravity. Swim to a different beat and achieve the same great aerobic exercise benefits.

Join in the fun of Water Aerobics.
Classes are offered Monday-Friday at noon
Monday, Tuesday and Thursday at 7:30 p.m.
Deep Water Jogging is Wednesday at 7:30 p.m.

Nutrition Notes

One often overlooked essential to our diets is water. Water plays a key role in body functioning. It is essential for flushing out waste produced in normal body functions; it helps in weight loss by carrying out the waste breakdown of fat; it maintains proper fluid balance, helps increase kidney function, is essential for maintaining muscle tone; and it helps keep the skin healthy and resilient. How much water do you need? About eight to ten glasses each day.

FitnessFacts

Many women want to start weight training but are afraid of becoming too muscular. The fact is only about two percent of all women have the necessary muscle capacity that will allow them to develop big muscles. Weight training is a great way for women to increase strength and lean body mass. Weight training, combined with 30 minutes of aerobic work 3 to 5 days per week, can lead to a more trim, well-defined body.

Working It Out

Ready for a change of pace? Try Double Step on Tuesdays at 3:15 p.m. Double Step incorporates the same moves as regular step class using two steps.

Don't forget about our weekend exercise sessions. Aerobics is offered on Saturdays at 9:45 a.m. and Step/Tone (1/2 of class is step and the other is toning) is offered on Sundays from 5:30-7 p.m.

If you're looking for more fun or a little change in your exercise routine, try Water Aerobics at the Natatorium. They offer a little more resistance and less stress on the joints. Classes are offered Mon.-Fri. at noon and Mon. Tues. & Thurs. at 7:30 p.m.

McVeigh lawyer demands inquiry of Dallas paper

▶ IN ANOTHER TWIST to the Oklahoma City bombing trial, Dallas Morning News faces accusations of stealing computer files.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — Timothy McVeigh's lawyer demanded an investigation Monday of the Dallas Morning News, accusing the newspaper of stealing hundreds of files from his computer, including a purported confession from the Oklahoma City bombing defendant.

Stephen Jones, while denying that the statement was in fact a confession, said: "There is no justification whatever for this criminal act."

Morning News lawyer Paul Watler said the newspaper met the highest ethical standards.

"We did not break any laws," he said. "We have no fear of criminal repercussions."

Jones said that the newspaper broke into the defense's computer files and obtained hundreds of documents for McVeigh and co-defendant Terry Nichols, as well as 25,000 FBI files. Jones offered no proof that theft was committed.

In a story the newspaper published online Friday — the deadline for 1,000 potential jurors to respond to a court questionnaire — the newspaper cited what it said was a defense memorandum that said McVeigh admitted to driving the explosives-laden truck that demolished the Oklahoma City federal building in April 1995. The memo said he chose a daytime attack to ensure a body count.

"It is not a legitimate defense memorandum," Jones said. "It is not a confession of Tim McVeigh."

Asked about Jones' demand for an investigation, U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman Leesa Brown said, "Right now we have not received anything formally from him."

Jones said he is considering asking for a 90-day delay in the trial as a cooling-off period. He also said he would seek to have the trial moved if the newspaper published any more stories from the documents.

He also said he would file a complaint with the Texas Supreme Court asking for an investigation into whether the reporter, Pete Slover, who is also a lawyer, should be disbarred.

Before Jones' news conference, Morning News executives filed a statement in court saying they would not report any more information from material used as the source of the previous articles.

The newspaper said it remains sensitive to the tension between McVeigh's fair trial rights and the national public interest in this case.

Editor Ralph Langer said the statement was in answer to concerns about disrupting the trial. He said the information already published by the newspaper was of public significance, but further articles based on the defense reports would not rise to the same level of importance.

All copies of the materials were turned over to the newspaper's lawyers for safekeeping, the Morning News said. Jones demanded that the documents be returned, saying they belong to the U.S. government.

VALORIE VOJDIK, lead counsel to Shannon Faulkner, addresses a large crowd in the Union's Forum Hall Monday night. Vojdik helped Faulkner in her pursuit to become the first female cadet at the Citadel in Charleston, S.C.

ATTORNEY SPEAKS ABOUT CITADEL CASE AND ELABORATES ABOUT HER ROLE ON THE

Battlefront for Women's Rights

In the 1990s, the fights that ensued when women tried to enroll at the Virginia Military Institute and the Citadel were discussed as if they were exactly the same case. After all, VMI and the Citadel were both respected, male-only, military schools.

But Valorie Vojdik says that is where the comparisons should begin and end.

Vojdik, who represented Shannon Faulkner in her case to get into the Citadel, spoke at K-State Monday night in the fourth Dorothy L. Thompson Civil Rights Lecture Series. Her lecture was titled, "The Battle for Gender Equity at the Citadel."

Vojdik spoke for less than 30 minutes, but a question-and-answer session following her speech lasted almost 50 minutes.

The VMI case took place in 1991, and the policies were kept in tact while Faulkner was allowed to enroll at the Citadel after a 2-1/2 year battle.

"At VMI, the Justice Department brought the lawsuit and didn't ask any women to testify and VMI shifted the focus away from the individual," Vojdik said.

Vojdik said in preparation for fighting the Citadel, she read the VMI case and was a little shocked to read the thoughts of those involved.

"They used a rationale that if you read the case, it was taking place in the 1940s or '50s," Vojdik said. "It said women couldn't deal with stress, that women would cry all the time, and it was a parade of stereotypes."

Vojdik said the key factor in a victory for Faulkner and company against the Citadel was that the individual was showcased to the decision makers and the public.

At the Citadel, they were able to see this was a case about discriminating against women, she said.

"It was about real people. They were able to see that these women wanted the same opportunities that their brothers or friends had. What we were able to do is persuade the people that women wanted the same challenges that men do," Vojdik said.

But it took a strong individual to serve as a punching bag to the intense scrutiny and hell that went along with the case. Aside from the Citadel administration and cadets, the public, for the most part, was pro-Citadel, Vojdik said.

CANDIDATE BILL BURNS, right, sophomore in business administration, and Greg Miller, senior in electrical engineering, said they feel they can bring new ideas and freshness to student government.

Candidates discover adventure during campaign

If Bill Burns has his way, K-State will help keep drunk students off the road, the line schedule will be improved and students will be more aware of what the Student Governing Association is doing.

"It's something new. It's an adventure for us," said Bill Burns, student body president hopeful.

The sophomore in business administration and his running mate, Greg Miller, senior in electrical engineering, hope to bring a new face and new ideas to SGA.

Burns said that neither he nor Miller have been involved with SGA, but they have been active in their fraternity. He said they feel that they can bring new ideas and freshness to student government.

"We're definitely a fresh voice. We may be lacking in experience, but we have come in very fired up," Burns said.

Burns and Miller have three main ideas that they would like to implement if they are elected as president and vice president of the student body.

First, Burns said they would

Candidates seek to break club atmosphere of SGA

The Student Governing Association has become an exclusive club whose members are only concerned with their own needs, Colin Rafferty, junior in English, said.

"Originally, the people now in office were interested in their campaign platform," he said. "Now it's run mostly by career student politicians."

Rafferty and Trey Hock, senior in English, are running for student body president and vice president, respectively, in the upcoming elections.

Hock was quick to point out that while they consider themselves political outsiders, they don't believe those people already in office are bad people.

"Somewhere along the line things got stale," Hock said "They came in with good ideas but those ideas were limited by the number of students they tried to reach."

Rafferty said the main reason they are running is for a chance to let the voice of the student body have an affect on SGA again.

• GORE ACKNOWLEDGES SOLICITING DONATIONS FOR CAMPAIGN.

WASHINGTON — Vice President Al Gore, under fire for his aggressive role in campaign fundraising, acknowledged Monday he solicited donations from his White House office but insisted he did not do anything wrong, much less illegal. Yet, he said he would never do it again.

"Everything I did, I understood to be lawful," Gore said, adding that he made only a few calls in search of contributions from his office, around the corner from the Oval Office. It is illegal for federal employees to solicit money in federal buildings, but Gore said he was not subject to that restriction.

He defended his actions in a high-stakes White House news conference, markedly different from his occasional appearances on behalf of administration initiatives. This time, Gore was trying to protect his political honor as he looks ahead to the presidential race in 2000.

Standing ramrod straight, he remained cool under sometimes argumentative questioning.

• LICKING RIVER FLOODS KEEPING RESIDENTS OUT OF HOMES.

FALMOUTH, Ky. — Rising water inundated entire towns in Kentucky and turned others into islands Monday as flooding kept thousands of people out of their homes across a four-state area.

The bloated Licking River receded slowly Monday, its muddy water still lapping 6 to 8 feet high against the walls and windows of downtown businesses and keeping residents out of their homes.

"We lost everything we had," said Jimmy Williams, who sat on a chair outside a shelter at a hilltop high school gymnasium, waiting with his dog, Sandy, and his bird, A.J. They were the only things he and his wife could get out of their house when Falmouth was inundated Saturday.

The town was among the hardest hit as flooding forced thousands of people from their homes in Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio and West Virginia.

Twenty deaths were blamed on flooding and tornadoes — including many who drowned or were washed from their cars — in addition to the 24 tornado deaths in Arkansas.

• CLINTON DISAGREES WITH ISRAELI PLAN TO BUILD NEIGHBORHOOD.

WASHINGTON — President Clinton chided Israel Monday for deciding to put up a new Jewish neighborhood in Jerusalem. Such a plan builds mistrust with the Palestinians, he said, as an emotional Yasser Arafat vented his objections at the White House and State Department.

"The important thing is on both sides to be building confidence and working together," Clinton said at a picture-taking session with Arafat in the Oval Office. "And so I would have preferred the decision not have been made because I don't think it builds confidence. It builds mistrust."

Clinton's brief remarks concerned the timing of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's decision last week and the effect it may have on talks the Israelis and Palestinians are to begin soon on Jerusalem's future and other touchy issues.

The president did not deal directly with the merits of Israel's claim to the city and its outskirts as the eternal capital of the Jewish people.

But his stance conflicted with Netanyahu's view that Israel can take unilateral actions altering the character of the city before negotiating with Arafat's Palestinian Authority.

K-State greeks honored regionally

KIM BRUNA
staff reporter

For the first time in history, K-State sororities and fraternities both were honored with the top award in mid-America.

The Panhellenic Council, the governing board for sororities on campus, and the Interfraternity Council, the governing board for fraternities, were both awarded with the Sutherland and Jellison awards, respectively.

These awards go to the top Panhallenic and IFC councils in mid-America.

"K-State has never won both the Interfraternity and Panhallenic awards in the same year, so this is just great," Tim Riemann, IFC external vice-president, said.

The awards were presented at the Mid-America Greek Council Association conference Feb. 20-23 in Chicago.

Riemann said that although the council officers accepted the awards, the awards really go to all K-State sorority and fraternity members.

"The entire KSU greek system won really big," Riemann said.

K-State competed against other schools in their division in eight program areas, which included community service, risk management and recruitment.

Both achieved a level of excellence mark in seven of the eight areas, Riemann said.

Winning these awards not only recognize the work of the past, but it will also help the councils in the future.

"It's a major bragging point," Riemann said. "As a greek system, we've always said we're very beneficial to the KSU campus."

Barb Robel, advisor for greek affairs, was also honored at the conference. Robel, who was one of the founders of the conference, had a symposium named after her to honor her work.

"It was in honor of all the hard work to establish this conference," Todd Rasmussen, public relations director of IFC, said.

With all these awards, Riemann said the trip to Chicago was beneficial.

"It was a good week for K-State in Chicago," Riemann said.

Student Alumni Board chooses new members

TRISHA LANGFORD
staff reporter

Recruiting perspective students and serving as a link between alumni and the student body are the responsibilities of the Student Alumni Board.

The 25-member board recently made selections to replace the 10 members leaving.

To begin the process, applications and nominations were selected by the KSU Alumni Association.

"A total of 94 applications were turned in," said Heather Landsdown, assistant director of alumni programs.

From the 94 applications submitted, half were selected for interviews. Interviews were given by a panel of alumni, faculty and former SAB members. The number of applicants was reduced to half after the interviews.

"Board members are required to have a general knowledge of the University and to have good presentation and speaking skills," Landsdown said.

To attain the general knowledge of the University, members are required to take a class during the fall. Speakers are brought in from the different colleges around campus to educate SAB members about their department.

SAB members represent a variety of students from many majors, cultures and living situations. All colleges, except Veterinary Medicine and Technology, are represented.

"By getting new members we are able to recruit from different colleges or groups. They add to the base," Marcia Hellwig, SAB member, said.

Another advantage to adding new members is the new perspective they can offer, Hellwig said.

"Anytime you bring new members to a group, you will bring diversity with new ideas and outlook. They energize the board with enthusiasm that will carry into the projects we do," said president Tim Riemann, junior in agriculture economics and pre-law.

The board will be hosting and assisting in three events this spring.

"This is a service-oriented job. Serving the University and the people in the Alumni Organization. It's a big honor, and I'm proud to be a part of it," Andy Armbruster, new member and freshman in agricultural journalism, said.

K-State starts first collegiate WOW

HANG NGUYEN
staff reporter

The first college chapter of Women of the World will be established at K-State at noon today at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art in the UMB Theatre.

"Women of the World, a nonprofit grassroots organization, exists to encourage, support and develop the unique leadership skills of women in political and economic arenas nationally and internationally," Lynn Hinkle, founder and president of WOW, said.

Founded in the summer of 1993, WOW first recognized the growing interest in the formation of college chapters more than a year ago. The first college chapter of WOW is being established at K-State because Steffany Carrel, a WOW board member and former K-State student, said she wanted to give back to the University.

"I want to give the students of K-State yet another way to become active participants in their University today, so that they may become active participants in their world tomorrow," Carrel said.

The establishment of WOW will feature speaker Joan Finney, former Kansas governor and WOW board member. Students interested in becoming college chapter members are invited. Interested faculty and staff are also encouraged to attend.

"It's a show up, sign up, membership drive," Carrel said.

Carrel said because K-State is her alma mater, she has volunteered to pay for the cost of the one-time $100 charter fee.

Students should ask if Union money is being spent wisely before fees increase Student Senate needs to take a close look at the money going into the K-State Student Union.

The sorry state of the Union affects all students, not just those who patronize it, because every student shells out money to the Union when they pay fees. It is their right as students and taxpayers to expect that money to be put to good use, yet the Union's service is in a decline.

And now that the Union has asked Student Senate for another $5 a semester from everyone, it's time for an accounting. The Union has made noises for years about becoming a self-sufficient, revenue-generating entity for the University, but that has not happened.

The lack of quality food service is a prime example. Union Station, a popular eatery on campus, has closed its kitchen, and a tiny piece of ham in the Union Stateroom runs about $2. Food prices have been increased to account for the increase in the minimum wage, yes, but there is no excuse for the abysmal quality of the food in the Union. The residence hall dining centers put the Union's food to shame.

Now that the Union is asking for even more money – this proposed fee increase is separate from the dollars given for Union enhancement – students deserve an explanation as to why their money seems to be going to waste in a Union that costs more money and provides fewer services.

It is the job of Student Senate to make sure student dollars are put to the best use possible, and although the Union might need this money to bring itself back up to speed, the campus deserves an explanation as to why it has gone so far downhill in the first place.

What is our money used for now? What is the fee increase going to be used for? And how is the money for Union enhancement being spent? The Union has an obligation to answer these questions for any student who wishes to ask.

Student fees should not be treated as a bottomless bank account for the Union or any other campus organization. If the money being asked for won't generate profits to cover it, Senate should look at trimming down the fee increase proposal. In any case, the Union has explaining to do – about its service and where the money is going.

what's the deal?
Cable no longer best bet in Manhattan

VIEWPOINT

JONATHAN WINKLER
JONATHAN WINKLER is a senior in mathematics, physics and English. You can e-mail your comments to Jonathan at (winkler@phys.ksu.edu).

Have you looked at your cable bill recently? If so, did you experience sticker shock?

According to my last cable bill, "Basic" and "Expanded Basic" costs $25.84 a month (including franchise fee). In the Manhattan/Ogden service area, this works out to 38 channels. In other, larger service areas, such as Kansas City and Wichita, cable companies normally charge no more than $40 for more than twice as many channels, and much of this money goes to finance improvements in service, such as the fiber optic cable Multimedia has been laying in Wichita.

When asked why TCI is not adding new channels in this service area, such as the Sci-Fi Channel, which is advertised ad nauseam on several cable networks, the TCI's telephone operators on Humboldt Avenue murmur something vague about "expensive equipment upgrades."

The bottom line is that residents in Manhattan pay half again as much per channel as subscribers in other cities, without prospects of any improvements in this part of their telecommunications infrastructure.

MIKE WEATHERFORD/Collegian

When cable television was born in the late 1960s, Congress partitioned the country into franchise areas and permitted the authority in charge of each area — usually municipal government — to sell exclusive cable broadcasting rights to a cable operator of its choice, usually at a derisory fee. By this scheme, Congress intended to force private development of a telecommunications infrastructure.

The 1992 Telecommunications Act reflects the same intent, but, by deregulating TV, telephone, and cable companies, it overlooks the consumer and encourages corporate hubris.

TCI is controlled by John Malone, a Colorado billionaire who has spent the past few years in takeover wars as part of his grand scheme to build a vertically integrated media trust. He is the living reincarnation of the 19-century steelmakers who bought up coal, ore-mining, and shipping companies so as to have complete control of the product, from the mine shafts where the raw materials were wrested out of the earth to the consumer's doorstep where the finished item was delivered.

He has eaten up Time Warner and nearly ate up Paramount. Since corporate takeovers depend heavily on loaned money, TCI — the crown jewel of Malone's empire — has to pay off debts incurred by these conquests. Manhattan has no local TV stations, so a TV set entails a cable subscription and thus a captive market for TCI. So every one of the 8,000 or so households in Manhattan pays a five-dollar monthly tax to ransom Malone's imperial ambitions.

The form letter TCI sends every year to college subscribers urging them to sign up for cable TV hypes a subscription as "one of the best entertainment values in Manhattan." Possibly this was true several years ago, before competition reduced the price of a video rental from the $2.50 that prevailed in this area before 1995 to the 49 cents it is now.

A typical, busy college student normally has time to watch no more than seven to 10 hours of television a week, or the equivalent of three and a half to five movies in the same time period. A four-week month and no more than three movies a week implies an entertainment budget of about six dollars.

Half again this amount will barely pay for "Basic" service (18 channels). The actual cost of entertainment through cable TV is about one-third higher because 15 minutes of every hour on every network except PBS is devoted to commercial advertising, which can only by a stretch of the imagination be called entertaining.

There is no reason you should finance somebody else's grandiose delusions, especially if he is unwilling to give you something in return. I suggest a form of civil disobedience. Get into a pool with as many people as you can and buy a single cable subscription. Hook up the "live" cable to a VCR so that all of you can keep up with your favorite TV shows on the strength of that single subscription: with enough people benefiting from it, it might indeed become one of the "best entertainment values in Manhattan."

That little riddle illustrates the pedestal we Homo sapiens have placed ourselves on. Humankind has always assumed superiority to all other animals, when really we are just the current beast residing atop nature's food chain.

These notions of superiority are beginning to change because of a few adults in white lab jackets who like to play with sheep.

A team of Scottish scientists announced last week that they have successfully cloned an adult mammal; namely, a sheep called Dolly. They achieved this "miracle of science" by injecting genes from a 6-year-old ewe into a batch of unfertilized eggs and used them in an attempt to foster pregnancies in other sheep.

The end result is, of course, Dolly. Dolly is an exact genetic copy of the ewe. She was born way back in July.

When I saw this on the news last Sunday night, I initially thought I was watching some evening comedy program where they were parodying a newscast. It was all just too surreal to grasp.

I kept thinking, "They cloned a mammal?" Well, goodbye Charles Darwin, hello "Brave New World." It turns out Aldous Huxley's novel wasn't that far immersed in science fiction.

As the news of the clone trickled in throughout the week, I noticed a disturbing trend. In Monday's Associated Press story about Dolly, the proposition of cloning humans was mentioned as ethically unthinkable numerous times. Later in the week on CNN's Talk Back Live they were discussing whether humans should be cloned.

Dolly has moved the world from surprise to fright to intrigue. An editorial from Sydney, Australia, asks the question: Should humans be cloned? On Monday in the media's biased reporting, it was assumed that humans should not be cloned. Now the same media is calling for a worldwide debate into the matter.

If we do start cloning humans, who is going to keep the technology out of certain leaders hands? We already have enough megalomaniacs populating the planet. I'm talking about the two people in Libya and Iraq. People who are bold enough to clone themselves in some futile attempt at immortality. Imagine for a moment a hundred Saddams running around the Middle East.

Don't think it couldn't occur — cold cash makes quite a bit happen.

After we do begin cloning humans, do they receive the same moral considerations that the rest of us properly bred folk get? Or do we just pick, poke and prod them until they lose their cloned minds?

Cloning humans could offer an assortment of amusing experiments. I, for one, would like to see nature versus nurture unfold before my eyes.

If we dug up Albert Einstein and cloned him, could he advance his predecessor's work? Would he even want to? Would he comb his hair this time? How would his maker handle him choosing to become a baker or politician?

Wait, Einstein was much too bright to ever want to become a politician.

What if we cloned Charles Manson and raised him in a nice home with loving parents? Would he still flip out and tattoo a swastika onto his forehead and ask people to shove chain saws into others?

The same test applies to anyone who is cloned. How much of who we are is nature and how much is nurture?

I propose we clone Mahatma Gandhi and raise him in a Spartan-like atmosphere. Each day we bombard him with violence and war. I would bet you a shiny new nickel that old Mahatma wouldn't have any qualms with violence.

These experiments lead me to believe that if we were to begin cloning ourselves, it would be like kicking nature in the groin. It's just an insult to humanity.

Nature is not supposed to be a factory line where everyone is spit out looking the same. Luckily humans are as unique as snowflakes. It would be a farce to alter that.

Science has brought us to the stoop of another shrouded doorstep. No one really knows what to do. Do we clone, or do we ignore the technology our intelligentsia has wrought?

As Huxley argued in "Brave New World," when science tosses human dignity aside, it destroys those human values we hold so dear.

Only time will tell.

• AVILA'S CONVICTION REFLECTS DEEPER PROBLEMS.
Editor,

In regards to Chris Avila and his conviction, I feel no sympathy for him nor do I believe that his behavior reflects human frailties.

Rather, I believe that anyone who is deliberately engaging in (what should be) intensely private sexual behavior where other people can see him or her has psychological problems.

I also doubt that anyone who is insensitive enough to deliberately frighten other people with the behavior (Avila admitted that he knew his neighbors reacted negatively but continued anyway) is capable of responding to his constituents' concerns; which is not a good quality in a student senator.

If Avila wants to touch the lives of students, let him stick to touching his own life.

I and the other female grad students on campus want him to stay out of ours.

Claudette Riley and the Collegian should be applauded for the story of the lewd behavior of a K-State student senator.

You have done this guy a favor by not brushing it under the rug. He needs help, as his actions are not generally accepted.

Such behavior signals underlying problems that, unless addressed and treated, would undoubtedly lead to a continued perverse life.

Good luck, Mr. Avila.

Candidates look at SGA inaccessibility, school funding imbalance as issues in election

Four years ago, there was a lot of talk about putting a bass pond on the K-State campus. I ask you, dear students, where is that bass pond now? Simply put, it does not exist.

It was one thing in a long line of failed visions, such as designated driver taxis or lowered tuition proposed by past student body presidents.

That's what myself, John Farrell, and my running mate, Mark Moessner, promise that will not happen with our unquestionable leadership we will lavish upon K-State during the 1997-98 school year if elected.

As your paramount leaders, we will strive to make this campus the most proactive campus in the Big 12.

I remember a story my grandfather, Ben Lowenstein, told me when I was young.

He said, Johnny, you can do like others or you can do like you want. I have always remembered his words.

As your president, I will stop the corruption that plagues our student senate. I will close the exclusive country club that is SGA and reopen it as a corner cafe for the common student. No longer will senators act as pawns to a megalomaniac executive leadership. No longer will senators act as sycophants to higher powers.

But I am not only a revolutionary visionary, I also want to clean up other issues outside of SGA.

Did you know 18 percent of all the money the Foundation raises is for our athletic program? That is more than any other academic program at K-State.

Now do you wonder why it was so hard to raise money for the Farrell Library expansion?

Now do you wonder why many of our academic programs are currently housed in out-dated facilities that are lower in quality than many of our peer institutions?

This imbalance of funding needs to stop. But every time the money rolls in, the powers-that-be find another need that did not exist before.

I believe that we should take care of what we have, not build facilities we cannot support.

As you can see, we cannot afford to ignore these issues. As a proud Wildcat, I cannot bear to see the university slowly losing its grip on its most basic foundations. My year as president would do much to stop this from occurring.

Remember to vote Farrell and Moessner — do not ask us to beg for votes because we will.

We may not be the career politicians you are used to, but we also do not hike our pants up to our ears.

As this election wraps up and I walk out of the voting booth next week, I will think: Lowenstein, Lowenstein. And I will also be thinking about you. Cheerio, pip pip.

Time to open up that mail bag: insight provided for professional coaches, players

(Editor's note: Shane was found sniffing some Bond White Liquid Paper, so these letters might be factitious.)

Well it's that time of the year again. Time to open up the old mail bag.

Since some of these individuals took the time to write me, I feel they deserve a response.

Dear Shane,

Well Shane, this place has just turned into a quarterback circus.

We've looked at Jeff George, Chris Chandler, Heath Shuler and Elvis Grbac. I think we are going to end up signing Grbac, but I'm worried he won't accept our $100 a year offer.

If we can't land him, what do you think we should do?

Carl Peterson
Kansas City Chiefs

Dear Carl,

Let's just take a look at your recent history with San Francisco 49er quarterbacks. Joe Montana ... bust. Steve Bono ... bust.

Grbac is just another Bono reincarnated to haunt the Chiefs with mediocre play.

VIEWPOINT

SHANE McCORMICK

SHANE McCORMICK is a senior in radio/TV. You can e-mail comments to Shane at (shanem@ksu.edu).

Stay away from Schuler. He is just another Bill Kenney at best.

Your best bet is to get someone at a interim basis and groom a young quarterback for the future.

You might look into luring Jeff Hostetler away from the Raiders and have him start for a year. He's a tough competitor who can still throw the long ball better than Bono.

Then, in the draft, try to grab a Jake Plummer or Pat Barnes. Either would be a nice choice for the future.

Dear Shane,

We are a little concerned about the recent test scores by Iowa State running back Troy Davis.

We noticed he didn't do too well on the Wonderlic Personnel Test. Should we be concerned when it comes time for draft day?

Anonymous NFL scouts

Dear Scouts,

He scored a six on the standardized intelligence test — so what? So, the guy isn't the brightest guy when it comes to test time.

Hey, we have all had trouble on those types of tests before. Just look at Michael Irvin, Erik Williams and Leon Lett.

Everybody knows that they aren't the brightest guys in the world, but they are playing in the big leagues (when they aren't suspended).

Forget Davis' scores. He will be a great NFL running back, draft him if you have the chance.

Dear Shane,

I've tried to improve things around here during the off season. What do you think of the recent additions?

Herk Robinson
Kansas City Royals

Dear Herk,

I think you are finally getting the picture. This off season, you actually picked up free agents who should be productive players.

The additions of Jeff King, Jay Bell and Chili Davis will give you a tremendous lift in the power department.

Now, all you have to do is trade closer Jeff Montgomery. Yes, he is a great relief pitcher. But you could get a lot for him right now, possibly a strong starting pitcher or another strong offensive force.

Plus, you have a young, talented relief pitcher in Jamie Bluma, who will be better than old Monty some day.

Dear Shane,

Hey, I've had a lot of trouble in the past with this whole draft thing.

I cannot draft a player that will be productive. Do you have a solid choice for me in the first couple of rounds?

Barry Switzer
Dallas Cowboys

Dear Barry,

You have already lost wide receiver Kevin Williams to free agency. You will probably lose Kelvin Martin also.

You never know what Irvin will do off the field. You need someone who will fill the receiver position and be a positive role model for your players, someone they can look up to.

You cannot go wrong with the selection of wide receiver Kevin.

KJERSTEN LARSON tosses a pass over Nebraska's Anna DeForge Feb. 12 at Bramlage Coliseum, when K-State defeated Nebraska, 47-45. The women's team will face Oklahoma at 2:20 p.m. today at the Big 12 tournament in Kansas City.

Dedication and work ethics help Wildcat Kjersten Larson envision the

The big picture.

This has been the vision of Wildcat senior guard Kjersten Larson during her basketball career at K-State.

Larson and the rest of the women's basketball will meet the Big 12 as they open the conference tournament against Oklahoma today in Kansas City.

Her dedication and work ethic has led her to be a team leader. As her coaches have reminded the team, taking each step and looking at the big picture will help them develop.

"After Colorado, they said, 'Be happy about that, but know who you have next and keep that in your mind,'" Larson said.

This strategy has kept Larson focused on the current season, not looking back.

At the beginning of the season, a lot of changes occurred for the Wildcats, the biggest difference being the coaching staff. After Brian Agler left the Cats as head coach last season, Deb Patterson was brought in as his permanent replacement. According to Larson, the change was completely positive.

"It was a night and day between the coaching staffs," Larson said. "Their (Patterson and staff) approach is so different. They are a coaching team. They have so many great aspects."

Larson said she has enjoyed this year and learned something new every day. All of this work produced admiration for the coaching staff.

"There is a respect of our coaches, not just authority. It's that you care for them."

This respect also produced a work ethic that Larson did not mind producing.

"You want your players to go through brick walls and for them we would," Larson said.

That respect also comes from the coaching staff. Coach Patterson said Larson contributed in many ways to the team's success this year.

"I think KJ is in large part the glue that held this team together," Patterson said. "She handled everything I've given her — from starter to 11th man to sixth man — she's a great defensive stop for us."

"I can't say enough good things about her."

Larson, a native of Maple Grove, Minn., arrived at K-State in 1993. During that time, she has gone through various changes in her life and position on the team, including starter to sixth man. Larson has taken each change in stride.

One constant in her career has been some of her teammates. Andria Jones and Missy Decker arrived at K-State the same time as Larson. While they spend large amounts of time together during practice and games, the three are also roommates.

"I'm proud of the three of us," Larson said. "We've stuck it out and stayed together."

Learning from Jones has also helped Larson with her own play.

"Andria has a lot of talent, and I love that about her," Larson said. "That's what's fun about us. She realizes I have to work for what I get."

Jones, who leads the team this season in points, said Larson leads the team by example.

"Whether she gets lots of minutes or not, she's the person we look to," Jones said. "She's hard nosed. She's always going 120 percent all the time. She's a great competitor."

Feb. 22 was Larson's last game in Bramlage Coliseum. Emotions were high as the Cats were defeated by KU, and Larson said the reason it was difficult for her was not because it was her last game on her home court.

"I think the hardest thing is going to leave the team," Larson said. "Saying goodbye to people is harder than bye to a coliseum."

As her final minutes of being a Wildcat begins to run out, Larson is already looking ahead. She has set new goals and plans on reaching them.

Larson, senior in speech and communications, plans on staying at K-State for graduate school. She will also set goals for herself physically, as she works in the weight room.

Whatever she does, Larson said she will use what she has learned from her basketball career in life, enabling her to always see the big picture.

Cats hope opportunity does not vanish against Cowboys in first Big 12 tourney

SUN DEE MILLS
sports writer

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The K-State women's basketball team begins to claw its way to its first NCAA Tournament appearance in 10 years this afternoon in Kansas City.

The Cats, with the fifth seed in the Big 12 Tournament, take on the No. 12 Oklahoma Sooners at 2:20 p.m. at Municipal Auditorium.

"To just be a part of the Big 12 Tournament is exciting, and it's a great opportunity for us as well as some great basketball," Coach Deb Patterson said.

Oklahoma coach Sherri Coale said the Sooners, 5-21 overall and 1-13 in the Big 12, are looking for a chance for new life against the Cats.

"We are a team that feels that this is a new opportunity for us, because everybody starts with an equal opportunity to win this tournament," Coale said. "We feel like this is a good place for us to perhaps surprise someone."

The Cats met the Sooners once before during the season, Feb. 8 in Norman, Okla.

It was the Cats' first conference road win, but not a decisive one, with a final score of 49-47.

Coale said both teams played solid defense, and if the Sooners had sank free throws, they would have won.

"We went on a span of 11 minutes in the second half holding Kansas State to no points," Coale said. "They didn't get a field goal, they didn't get a free throw, we only scored seven."

Sooner forward Phylesha Whaley scored 12 points and forward Tina Taylor posted a double-double with 11 points and 10 rebounds.

Patterson said the Cats' defense and rebounding won the game in Norman. Contributing to the day's rebounding was Cat senior forward Andria Jones with 18, her season-high.

Jones also scored 28 points, making her a player the Sooners have to contain, Coale said.

"We have to control Jones. We know she's a great player," Coale said.

"She got us for 28 points and 18 boards, and that's something that we cannot allow to happen."

For the season, the Cats' efforts on the boards were awarded with a tie with Kansas for first place in the Big 12 with a 5.1 rebounding margin in conference games.

The Cats average 35.1 rebounds a game and allow their opponents an average 30.1.

In 1996, the dissolved Southwest Conference and the Big 8 combined to send seven teams to the NCAA Tournament, more than any other league in the nation.

Patterson said recent upsets in the SEC could lead to this number for the Big 12.

"I'm hopeful that they will go six deep and maybe give our seventh a look," Patterson said.

"We're just hopeful that the NCAA committee sees it that way.

"Our ball club has played the kind of schedule that we need to play to accumulate good wins and even our losses to be good losses."

With a NCAA berth on the line, Patterson said the team was prepared to gain a second-round game.

"I really believe our focus coming into this game is just to really respect the game," Patterson said.

"Going into this Oklahoma game, I believe we will have the real seriousness and with the intention that we need to play the kind of game that we need to play to be successful."

Experience helps track team in indoor competition

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

Thank goodness for the experience factor.

Five K-State track and field athletes competed in the USA Indoor Championships in Atlanta over the weekend, and fortunately, it was not their first time to be at the national event.

"It a huge arena, and there are a lot of competitors," Steve Fritz, throwers coach, said. "It takes a little to get used to."

But those who competed in the meet were used to it solely because all of them had been in it last year.

"Last year, I got a lot more nervous, and I think, a lot more people were there because it was an Olympic year," Renetta Seiler said. "But I was a lot more calm this year because I knew what to expect."

Seiler placed second in the weight throw with a heave of 63'11-1/2", followed by Kirsten Schultz, who finished eighth with a hurl of 51'8". Seiler's mark was just an inch under her personal record.

"Both Kirsten and Renetta threw decent," Fritz said. "Kirsten did a great job by making finals, and I was happy she got there because it was her last indoor meet."

Also in competition was triple jumper Vanitta Kinard, who placed fourth in the event as she jumped 43' 5-1/4". It was also Kinard's second time at the meet, and she said she wasn't trying to peak, but rather work on her routine for the NCAA Indoor Championships this weekend.

"I had a new approach this week," Kinard said. "I took a 16-step approach instead of a full stride of 18."

Karissa Stewart competed in the 60-meter dash, but her time did not qualify her for the finals.

The only male to make the trip was Travis Livingston, who posted a 7.98 time in the 60-meter hurdles. Livingston did not qualify for the finals.

Meanwhile, up in Ames, Iowa, other K-State tracksters were competing in a last-chance qualifier meet.

Keith Black posted the third best time in the country to date with a time of 45.80 seconds in the 400-meter dash.

Black's numbers earned him the second place spot in the event and automatically qualified him for the NCAA tournament.

Weight-thrower Gene Petersen strengthened his personal record in the shot put when he tossed 58'3", which placed him fourth in the finals.

Emily Diederich, Ryan Johnson and Scott Galas ran in the 800-meter run.

K-State finishes its indoor season this weekend in Indianapolis.

So you want to get that deposit back? Then spring cleaning is beckoning you. Grab those pails, brooms and cleaning products because it's time for mopping up the slop

STORY BY YVONNE PEARSON • ILLUSTRATION BY MATT HAWKINS

Spring is known for warm weather, flowers blooming, green grass and the dreaded spring cleaning.

Some students admitted they do not do any spring cleaning.

"Our motto is, if it stinks, throw it out," Justin Moore, junior in nutrition and exercise science, said.

This seemed to be the consensus of students. However, there are some things students who care about cleanliness and safety could do to maintain their residences inside and out.

For the inside of homes, students should check for fire hazards, said Chuck Tannehill, assistant director of technical services at the Manhattan fire department.

"Some common things we find in homes are different types of turpentines, solvents, paint cans, car batteries and things like that," Tannehill said. "All of these things could potentially start a fire and should be taken down to the recycling center to be properly disposed of."

Students should also check extension cords and electric blankets for frayed cords, Tannehill said.

Other things that should be checked are fire extinguishers and smoke detectors.

"It's real important that you have operating fire extinguishers and smoke detectors," said Tannehill.

To check a fire extinguisher, one should shake the canister. If powder can be felt slipping back and forth it is safe. If it does not move or if it makes a clunking noise, it is a faulty extinguisher and should be replaced.

Tannehill said this should be done at least every two years.

Having a smoke detector cuts the chances of dying in a fire in half. A detector's life-saving power is cut if it stops working. That's why testing should be done once a month and batteries should be installed annually.

Another part of spring cleaning is finding ways to cut high utility bills.

"Some of the biggest wastes of energy are either leaky faucets or dirty furnace filters," said Dennis Boddy, department manager at Ace Hardware and Appliance. "Those are both really easy to maintain."

Furnace filters should be checked once a month and replaced when they are full of dirt. When replacing a filter, always make sure the airflow arrow is pointed up and vacuum around the furnace.

"You'd be surprised by how much money you could save if you'd just make it a routine to clean and change filters," said Boddy.

Savings on utilities is not limited to the inside of the house.

Students living in mobile homes should look at their roofs and make sure the coating is good.

"There should be a real good reflective coating on there," said Boddy. "If it doesn't have a good reflective coating it won't be able to cool off the inside of the home."

Boddy said he suggests using a reflective roof coating such as "Snow Roof." It is bright white, 90-percent reflective and cools roof temperatures from 200 to 80 degrees. It can be used on mobile homes, tar roofs, asphalt roofs, metal and concrete.

Gutters should also be checked to make sure they are clean and not falling away from the home.

Boddy said if gutters are falling away from the house, just pound them back into place. If this does not work, a new one should be installed.

They also need to be cleaned out with a water hose to ensure proper flow of water.

To help clean up the community, the city will conduct its annual Spring Clean-Up from March 31 through April 4.

"Citizens can put out pretty much anything they want to get rid of at this time," said Chuck Williams of City Hall Public Works Department. "It's proven to be a valuable program to assisting citizens and students with no charge to them."

City crews will pick up yard waste, limbs and branches. Refuse contractors will be responsible for all trash and debris during their normal pick-up time.

All yard waste must be in yard waste paper bags, which can be purchased at local retail stores. Limbs and branches must be in separate piles and placed on the curb in order to be picked up.

Refuse contractors will pick up anything that can be loaded by one person. Major household appliances, tires, batteries, concrete, rock rubble or other household hazardous waste will not be picked up.

"This is a time when students can get rid of old chairs, tables, TVs or whatever else they want to get rid of," Williams said. "It's a great time for people to go through and clean up their areas. Not only in their own rooms and apartments, but around their buildings as well."

TO WEDGE OR NOT TO WEDGE

A student from Texas A&M, John Culpepper, and his fraternity, Kappa Alpha, were indicted on a charge of criminal hazing in December. A grand jury found fraternity members guilty of lifting a candidate off of his feet by the waistband of his underwear. The candidate suffered from a severe wedgie that resulted in the surgical removal of one of his testicles.

LET'S MAKE A DEAL

The United States signed a lease with Moscow with the agreement that the United States would pay an annual rental of $72,500 rubles for the rental of the embassy in Moscow. At the time, $72,500 rubles was the equivalent to $60,000. The lease is still good for another nine years, but with the devaluation of the ruble, $72,500 in rubles is equivalent to $22.56. The United States continues to resist Moscow's attempts to renegotiate the lease early.

"Without Shannon, there would have been no case," Vojdik said. "It's rare that a person will come forward and be subject to the hostility and abuse and stand up to the massive opposition.

"You need a person strong enough to take the abuse and open the door and to stand up to that should be applauded."

Vojdik said if Faulkner hadn't been the one to initially come forward, the Citadel still might be all male.

"The women there now say they wouldn't have brought the lawsuit," Vojdik said. "They preferred to keep a low profile."

In her speech, Vojdik also touched on the Citadel haircut policy for incoming cadets.

"The Citadel argued that it was a neutral requirement, and if Shannon wanted equality, it meant getting the same haircuts as the males," Vojdik said. "The haircut is not gender neutral — it is inherently masculine, and it misses the point totally."

Vojdik revealed information regarding the background of the case, and that included the influence and role of the Citadel alumni.

They did everything and anything they could to keep their alma mater all male, she said.

"The alumni posed as one of our major barriers," Vojdik said. "They were very organized, and their support wasn't limited to letter writing. They provided money for the legal battle, and they mobilized politically to lobby the governor and legislature.

"I think a large part of the alumni's actions were done in fear and reluctance to allow women to enter the Citadel."

An estimated $500,000 was spent by alumni for legal fees.

Vojdik said Faulkner started the process, but it is far from completed.

"It's not enough to open the door," she said. "We need to go beyond that."

4 arrested in Salina in connection to New Mexico double homicide

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — Four men were arrested in Salina, on Monday after police found them traveling in a car belonging to one of two men found dead in an Albuquerque motel room.

The four men weren't immediately identified.

Police discovered two men dead in a room at the Imperial Motel on Feb. 25.

Police consider the case a double homicide and were searching for a car belonging to one of the victims, Victor Monzon, 41, of Albuquerque.

The four men were arrested in Monzon's car at about 4 p.m. Monday, said Albuquerque Police Department spokesman Tony Herrera.

"We have the car and four men," he said. "They are being held on suspicion of auto theft."

Herrera said Albuquerque detectives were traveling to Kansas.

The second victim in the slaying was Jesus Contreras, 33, also of Albuquerque.

RAFFERTY

"Last year," he said, "every candidate talked about this. Now it doesn't seem to be an issue anymore. It's not just opening the doors, it's actively seeking students out."

"If you can get students to vote, you can get them to talk," Hock said. "And it doesn't even matter how many actually vote — it's how many you can get to talk after the elections."

Rafferty said he believes the main issues mentioned in this campaign are parking, student fees and teacher evaluations, but all three have been discussed for some time within SGA. Moreover, the proposed solutions are already past the planning stages, he said.

As for student fees, Rafferty said he doesn't want to promise they won't be raised, citing Jeff Peterson's trouble with how to fund replacement X-ray machines in Lafene Health Center. Peterson campaigned on the promise that fees wouldn't be increased, and so refused to raise them to buy new machines, he said.

The trick, Rafferty said, will be to find and fund services that benefit the greatest portion of the student body.

"Last year, we talked to students and asked whether they would want lower fees with less services, or to raise fees to maintain the services," he said. "Most said they'd rather have lower fees."

Hock said the University should spend the most money on services that benefit the greatest portion of the student body.

"If no one uses the service, we should ignore it," he said.

Rafferty said teacher evaluations represent an issue that refuses to die, but one that many might not realize didn't always exist as a problem at K-State. Tevals used to be published in book form, he said.

"People started reading them less and less," he said, "and eventually lost interest."

He said now might be a good time to bring them back.

Overall, the two candidates say they're looking forward to seeing the solutions put in place, but more importantly, they look forward to future challenges.

"Whoever is in office when these problems are solved wins the political lottery," Hock said. "We're more interested in looking for the problems K-State will face in the future, so we can get started with solving them right now."

Rafferty said although they are newcomers to SGA, they at least have two useful attributes — a desire to help out and a fresh new look at the process of government.

"We can learn the ropes quickly," he said. "We plan to surround ourselves with a brain trust — experts in the various issues we might have to deal with. We'll listen to them."

Hock said they both have an obvious interest in making sure SGA isn't run into the ground.

"We both have to be here another year," he said. "If the system fails, it hurts us too."

BURNS

like to emphasize safety for students, especially in regards to drinking and driving.

"Our proposal is for a shuttle system from Aggieville to various sites," Burns said.

He said they had done the math and figured that fee increase of $0.96 per student would fund this project.

Secondly, Burns and Miller would like to improve communication with the students.

"We want to communicate with the student population more," Burns said.

By doing this they feel they can increase student participation in SGA and campus activities.

The two candidates have several ideas that they hope will achieve this.

"We're going to emphasize student involvement," Miller said.

Along these lines, Miller said they would like to increase voter turnout. He said last year only about 15 percent, or 3,000 students, of the student body participated in the elections.

"I think the Collegian could help everyone out by letting everyone know when voting is — March 10, 11 and 12," Miller said.

Burns said they would like to send mailers to students justifying fee increases by breaking them down.

"I think every student can understand them if they have it right in front of them," Burns said.

"We're going to show where the student money is going. Just the increases, not the whole tuition," Miller said.

"We would like to write an editorial in the Collegian every two weeks to inform students," Burns said.

Finally, Burns and Miller would like to improve the line schedule. Burns said they have gone away from the idea of publicizing teacher evaluations. The area that they are looking to improve upon is the listing of instructors in the line schedule.

Burns said he feels there are too many blanks and staff listings.

"They know who their staff is going to be for the next semester," Burns said.

He would like to have the majority of the instructor spaces filled and when they are not sure, he said they could put to be announced in the space.

"We're looking to make a difference," Burns said.

He said that the changes they would like to make if elected are not going to be huge changes, but small things that can make a difference for K-State students.

"We're not going to change the entire infrastructure. We are going to do little things that can make a difference," Burns said.

Juveniles may be tried as adults for charges related to slaying

▶ 3 CHARGED with first-degree murder, attempted first-degree murder in Friday's shooting.

CHRISTA K. CAREY
staff reporter

A lifetime Manhattan resident was shot to death last weekend.

Wanda A. Norman, 44, was killed in her boyfriend's Countryside Estates trailer at 10:50 p.m. Friday at 42 Powerline Place.

Her boyfriend, John Garner, 37, was seriously wounded and is under care at Mercy Health Center.

Three people, Dureal D. Campbell and Schakeer J. Davis, both 17 and residing at 711 Allison Ave., Apt. 12, and Delisha E. Branch, 25, of 466 Maple Wind Trailer Court in Ogden, were charged with first-degree murder, attempted first-degree murder, aggravated robbery and aggravated burglary.

All three suspects are being held on $250,000 bonds. Campbell is being held at the Riley County Jail, Davis at the juvenile detention facility in Junction City, and Branch at the Geary County Women's Facility.

The suspects could be facing the Hard 40, Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy said. The Hard 40 is 40 years of imprisonment without parole.

On Monday, Kennedy asked the court to try 17-year-old Davis as an adult.

Campbell, also 17, will be tried as an adult because he was on probation for a felony theft conviction.

Being tried as an adult results in more severe penalties. Adult courts can hand out stiffer punishments than juvenile courts.

All three will appear in Riley County court again next Monday.

The Riley County Investigations Department and Kennedy would not comment on a possible motive.

However, Wanda Norman's parents, Mervin and Peggy Norman, said police reported to them the details of the shooting.

As relayed by Peggy Norman, the suspects were looking for someone other than Garner or Wanda Norman. Upon entering the residence by shooting the lock off the front door and breaking a window, one of the suspects allegedly shot Garner in the face and in the side. Then Branch allegedly shot Wanda Norman in the head, but it was unclear whether Branch allegedly did all the shooting, Peggy Norman said.

After Branch allegedly shot Wanda Norman, she allegedly tried to shoot Garner again, but the gun misfired. The three then fled the trailer, Peggy Norman said police told her.

Police would not comment on the weapon or if it has been recovered.

Wanda Norman and Garner were arrested Feb. 20 on drug possession charges. Norman was arrested for possession of cocaine and drug paraphernalia. Garner was arrested for possession of a controlled substance. They were both released on bond.

"Whoever killed my daughter should get the max," Peggy Norman said.

Clinton bans funding for clone studies

▶ CLINTON URGES human cloning research to cease for ethical debate.

Clinton

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Declaring the creation of life a miracle that reaches beyond laboratory science, President Clinton on Tuesday barred spending federal money on human cloning. He also urged a halt in private research until the ethical effect is better understood.

Clinton, warning against trying to play God, directed all federal agencies not to allocate money for cloning of human beings — although he acknowledged Tuesday that the government is not now funding such research.

"I just wanted to make sure that we keep it that way," Clinton said during an Oval Office appearance before he departed for Arkansas to inspect tornado damage.

Citing the cloning of an adult sheep in Scotland, Clinton asked the National Bioethics Advisory Commission last week to review the ramifications cloning would have for humans and report back to him in 90 days.

But Clinton said he decided to restrict use of federal funds after learning that researchers in Oregon had cloned two rhesus monkeys from embryos — the world's first cloned primates and the closest step yet to humans.

"Human cloning would have to raise deep concerns, given our most cherished concepts of faith and

Increased voter turnout needed in SGA election

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

In the last student body election, only about 15 percent of the campus was compelled to vote.

Although such a small minority is responsible for electing student leaders, those leaders are charged with representing the entire student population.

The upcoming Student Government Association elections March 10-12 mean more than electing a name and a face. They affect what kind of issues will be dealt with next year and how well they will be done.

The power of an SGA president can be flexed on a state-wide basis, as former-president Jeff Peterson attempted to do with his Access the Future campaign for lowering tuition during his two years in office.

Or it can be used to effect campus change within the Kansas Board of Regents system, as current president Chris Hansen has attempted to do with faculty and course evaluations.

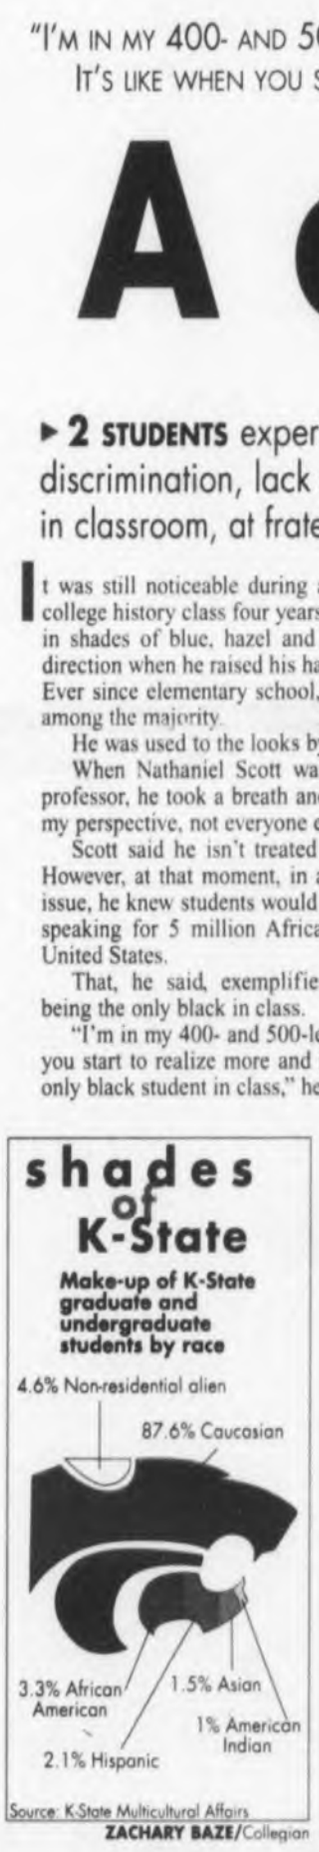
It was still noticeable during a lecture in his first college history class four years ago: a hundred eyes in shades of blue, hazel and green turned in his direction when he raised his hand to ask a question. Ever since elementary school, he sat almost alone among the majority.



He was used to the looks by now.

When Nathaniel Scott was recognized by the professor, he took a breath and said, "This is from my perspective, not everyone else who is black."

Scott said he isn't treated differently in class. However, at that moment, in addressing a cultural issue, he knew students would perceive that he was speaking for 5 million African Americans in the United States.

That, he said, exemplifies the unfairness of being the only black in class.

"I'm in my 400- and 500-level classes now, and you start to realize more and more that you're the only black student in class," he said. "It's like when you see a white shirt with a black dot on it. When you look at the shirt, you'll notice the black dot first."

ZACHARY BAZE/Collegian

William Hicks, junior in agricultural economics, also felt the looks the first time his dark hands gathered silverware and he carried his food tray amid a crowded Union Staterøom. After he walked past the glances of several seated blacks, he wandered to a different section and ate his lunch with his new white fraternity brothers.

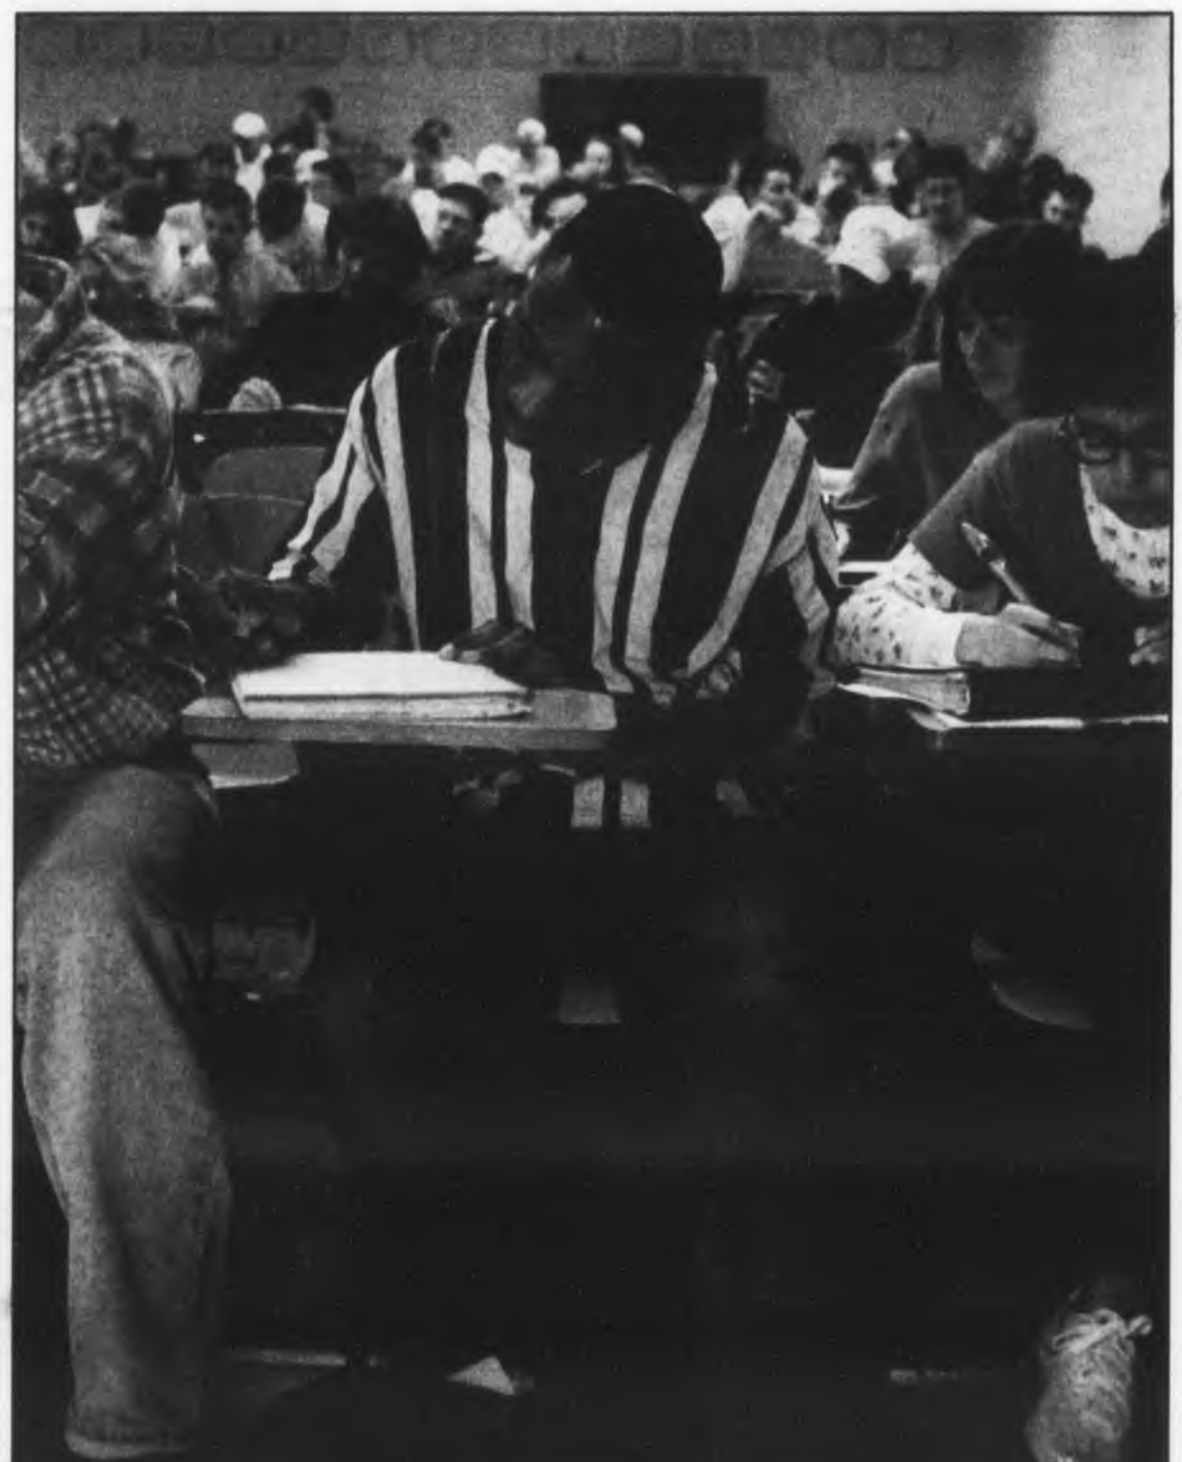
For most of his life, blond and brown hair was all he knew.

"I feel the eyes in class when people talk about issues like civil rights," he said. "Everyone looks at me to see if I'm going to get mad."

As two of the 592 black undergraduates who populate the K-State campus, Scott and Hicks said they agree racial boundaries still exist on the K-State campus.

"I think racially, if numbers were more even, you wouldn't be so surprised to see a black face in your class," Hicks said.

K-State Associate Athletic Director Veryl Switzer said there is no comparison in the awareness of diversity that he experienced as a K-State student in the 1950s to the levels reached in the 1990s.



But Switzer said it is important to befriend all people, no matter what their race is.

"If you're part of the majority, you should be friendly enough to make the minority not feel isolated in class," he said. "The burden falls on the shoulders of the majority."

Switzer makes it a practice to greet people as he walks through campus. He said people almost always return the greeting.

"I like to test the environment," he said. "Sometimes we don't apply it, but K-State is a friendly environment. It's full of friendly people. It's

• MCVEIGH'S LAWYER DECIDES NOT TO SEEK DELAY IN TRIAL.

DENVER — Timothy McVeigh's lawyers decided Tuesday not to seek a delay in his trial, saying they believe the Oklahoma City bombing suspect can get a fair trial despite a newspaper story on his purported confession.

The defense team made the decision after discussing options with McVeigh, and then meeting with U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch and prosecutors.

"We did not ask for a continuance. We gathered with the government and with the judge, and we were all on the same page," lawyer Stephen Jones said as he left the 45-minute meeting at the federal courthouse.

He said jury selection will start as scheduled, on March 31.

"That's what our client wants and that's what we want, and I think that's what everybody wants," he said.

Prosecutor Pat Ryan said he did not believe a delay was necessary.

"I share the confidence of Mr. Jones and the court that the people here will be able to give Mr. McVeigh a fair trial," he said.

The meeting came a day after Jones said he was considering a 90-day delay in the start of McVeigh's trial because of a story published by the Dallas Morning News. The paper cited the defense memorandum that said McVeigh admitted to driving the explosives-laden truck that demolished the Oklahoma City federal building in April 1995.

Jones accused the newspaper of basing its story on a document he said it stole from his computer files. The defense later said the confession was a ploy to elicit statements from someone else the defense suspected in the bombing.

Neither Ryan nor Jones had a heightened concern about selecting an impartial jury.

"We'll give more attention to the extent to which jurors have seen maybe accounts of this case, but other than that we expect the jury selection process to go forward as planned," Ryan said.

McVeigh and co-defendant Terry Nichols are charged with murder, conspiracy and weapons-related charges in the bombing, which killed 168 people. Nichols will be tried after McVeigh, but a date has not been set.

• PERUVIAN REBELS REFUSE TO NEGOTIATE FOR EXILE TO CUBA.

LIMA, Peru — Cuba is willing to take in the Peruvian rebels holding 72 hostages in Lima, but the leftist guerrillas — in the third month of their siege — don't want to go.

Peruvian President Alberto Fujimori came away from his surprise visit to Cuba on Monday with the asylum offer from Fidel Castro. In Lima, however, guerrilla leader Nestor Cerpa scoffed at the idea of going into exile.

Cerpa refused to attend an afternoon negotiating session with the government in Lima. He told reporters that the only place he wants to go after the crisis is resolved is the Peruvian jungle where his guerrilla movement — which draws its ideology from Castro's Cuban revolutionaries — was born.

Castro said he will give the rebels asylum only if asked, and there was no immediate indication that Fujimori had asked them.

• SOME FLOOD VICTIMS CLEAN UP, OTHERS AWAIT THE WORST.

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — Muddy rivers slowly retreated to their banks in parts of Kentucky, revealing acres of muck-covered destruction, while people along the rising Ohio River braced for a record crest.

Two more bodies were found Monday as water receded, raising the death toll to 12 in Kentucky. In all, 48 deaths were blamed on weekend storms, flooding and tornadoes in the region, including 25 killed by twisters in Arkansas.

1st collegiate WOW chapter initiated

HANG NGUYEN
staff reporter

The first college chapter of Women of the World organization was initiated Tuesday afternoon at the UMB Theatre in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

MICAH ARMBRUSTER/Collegian

JOAN FINNEY spoke yesterday afternoon at the Women of the World organizational meeting. The organization met in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

The primary goal of the K-State Women of the World College Chapter will be to promote the education and involvement of all individuals who want to participate in the modern democratic process in both existing and emerging democracies worldwide, Lynn Hinkle said. Hinkle is the founder and president of WOW.

Joan Finney, former Kansas governor and WOW member, was the guest speaker at Tuesday's event. She encouraged women to become involved in business and profession.

"The change comes on the campuses," Finney said. "It's the young people who initiate the change."

To further that change, each college chapter is provided with a flexibility of focus consisting of three committees that can be formed depending on the will and direction of that chapter.

The economic, political and leadership committees provide members with the opportunity to choose what they are most interested in.

"We wanted the chapters to be able to decide their own agenda and set their own priorities," said Steffany Carrel, board member and former K-State student.

Members might choose to become involved, either individually or as a committee, in the opportunities advanced by the WOW parent organization in its efforts to train women worldwide in their respective political systems.

"Anyone who considers herself to be part of the future will want to be involved with this organization," Hinkle said. "We will give her the tools to positively affect her own future."

Anything that unites and empowers women can be a positive force, Ruth Ann Wefald, co-sponsor of the event, said.

"It will broaden the horizon for women and get them to think globally," she said.

WOW's initial success stemmed from the training sessions in St. Petersburg in Russia in 1993.

Russian women interested in taking a seat in the Parliament were trained on how to send out their messages, how to effectively use the media and how to communicate with voters.

As a result, the women were able to collect the 35,000 signatures needed to be on the ballet. Also, because of WOW's first leadership training program in 1993, the Women's Party of St. Petersburg was started. The organization now has 15,000 members.

K-State's chapter's membership fee is $15 per semester. Five of the $15 will go to the parent organization. Carrel wrote a check for the one time $100 fee to begin the chapter.

What the K-State chapter does will really dictate what WOW will do on other campuses, Carrel said.

"I think it allows a lot of opportunity that's out there," Maggie Keating, junior in political science, said. "I think this organization can come together and be a force on campus."

WOW is now in the process of choosing co-advisors for the K-State chapter.

People interested in the organization can visit WOW's website at (http://www.astrawow.com/astra).

The site allows people to communicate with WOW members and will help future college chapters to talk with one another.

Riemann prepares for final interview

Riemann

If at first you do not succeed, try again.

This could be the motto for Tim Riemann.

Riemann, junior in pre-law and agricultural economics, was informed Feb. 27 that he was a finalist for the $30,000 Truman Scholarship.

Riemann was one of four K-State nominees for the scholarship in January.

When the finalists were announced, Riemann was among those chosen.

Since the Truman committee looks at hundreds of applications, there is an appeals process, which enables universities to encourage the committee to look at an applicant one more time.

"The University appealed on my behalf," Riemann said. "They go through so many applications that K-State just asked them to look at mine again, because they thought I was a good choice."

The Truman committee reviewed Riemann's application again and chose him as a finalist.

Riemann will now join other Truman finalists March 14 in Kansas City, Mo., for a final interview. Recipients will be announced March 28.

City Commission approves funding for bike path, safety improvements

DAVID FAIRBANKS
staff reporter

The Manhattan City Commission met Tuesday night to approve the 1998 request for funds from the City/University Special Projects Fund.

These funds will be used to complete campus-wide projects at K-State.

The City/University Special Projects Fund was formed when the City of Manhattan annexed K-State in July 1994.

When the fund was formed, it was decided that each proposed project must be found to be mutually beneficial to the community of Manhattan and K-State.

Ron Fehr, assistant city manager, once again opened his presentation to the commission by playing a short excerpt of "The Wabash Cannonball" through his laptop computer. He then reviewed with the commission how much money is being requested for each project.

The list entails six separate projects that combine to form a $342,000 grand total.

"The great thing about these projects is that each and every one of them came from student proposals," Bill Muir, assistant to the vice president, said.

Heading up the list is the request for $50,000 for bicycle infrastructure improvements.

This money will be put toward adding bicycle parking stalls, constructing new paths on campus and finishing phase two of the bicycle master plan.

Phase one of the plan will be completed this year with the addition of a new path directly north of Farrell Library. This addition will not only enhance the infrastructure, but also give K-State's campus emergency fire access from two sides, Muir said.

Listed as the second priority is the request of $45,000 to enhance campus lighting and safety.

This request allocates $25,000 for adding lights to McCain Auditorium, Nichols Hall and Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art areas of campus.

The other $20,000 will be used to purchase three or four video cameras that will be installed in high-crime areas of campus.

These high-resolution cameras will tape continuously and be monitored by K-State Police in Edwards Hall.

The third priority on the list was a request of $25,000 to connect the Manhattan Public Library with Farrell's card catalog and database. This will give members of the community access to all of Farrell's literature and other online capabilities.

The commission approved the 1998 requests with a 5-0 vote.

Commissioner Edith Stunkel said the process for approving the projects' monetary requests has improved each year.

"I really appreciate the work of the community and the University," Stunkel said.

Also covered in the meeting was the third reading of an ordinance that grants Southwestern Bell Telephone Co. a franchise with the City of Manhattan.

This franchise will change the way Manhattan residents pay their phone bills. Instead of paying a percentage of the total bill for phone-line access, residents will pay a flat rate of $1.02 per phone line.

Women's basketball at K-State needs kudos for this season's Big 12 performance

Because the K-State men's basketball team hasn't been quite up to par as of late, we ask that you turn your eyes to another venue — the K-State women.

Much to every sportscaster's surprise, the Cats have whipped through the Big 12 conference this season, surprising many opponents along the way.

After all, K-State was predicted to finish 11th in the conference after former coach Brian Agler left K-State. But Deb Patterson stepped in and has shocked the Big 12 onlookers, guiding the Wildcats to a fifth-place finish in the conference.

Senior forward Andria Jones took the Big 12 world by surprise, earning First-Team All-Big 12 honors on Sunday. Jones' senior leadership has helped direct the team through the Big 12, averaging upwards of 20 points per game. To say the least, this woman is a player.

Jones sits on a team that boasts two all-Americans in University of Kansas guard Tamecka Dixon and Texas Tech guard Alicia Thompson. Despite a loss to No. 1 KU on Feb. 22, the Cats have proven they can hang with the Big 12 elite.

Nobody really thought the women's basketball team was for real until it upset the Texas Longhorns at Bramlage Coliseum in February. It was a huge win.

K-State continues to do the same in Kansas City. With a 81-56 opening round shellacking against Oklahoma, the Cats have earned a spot in regionals today against the Texas Tech Red Raiders.

It's a shame that the women's tournament isn't televised because with a win today, K-State has solid chance of returning to the NCAA Tournament for the first time in 10 years.

It is in your province to support the women's basketball team whenever you can. If you can go to the tournament in Kansas City, Mo., do it. Tickets still remain and can be purchased through the Bramlage Coliseum box office.

If you can't make it, you can always count on the Collegian for complete women's tournament basketball coverage.

Our View, an editorial selected and debated by a majority of the editorial board, is written by the editorial board after a consensus opinion is reached. The editorial board consists of Collegian editors and students.

•MEATEATER HAS QUESTIONS ABOUT VEGETARIAN DIET, WAY OF LIFE.

Editor,

I am writing to respond to an article written by Page Getz earlier this week. She said one thing she does to make this world a better place is, among other things, choose not to eat slaughtered animals.

She has referred to this conviction of hers in other columns as well. I just have a question for her: Do you choose to be vegetarian because of dietary reasons or because it's cruel to animals to eat them? I just want clarification.

The animals of the earth were put here for humans to use. God gave humans dominion over all the animals of the earth; therefore, that is their intended purpose by God. It is not cruel to slaughter animals, and livestock is raised specifically for this purpose. Those cows aren't out there just to enjoy all the vegetation of the Earth.

For an alternative insight into this issue, listen to track 69 on Tool's "Undertow" compact disc.

The love bug

A partner's bout with the flu can challenge commitment

VIEWPOINT

MARY RENEE SMITH

MARY RENEE SMITH is a sophomore in speech and theatre. You can e-mail your comments to Mary Renee at (mojo@ksu.edu).

If you love someone, I beg you to get the flu shot.

Not long ago, the bounds of my love were challenged by a wicked case of influenza. My normally handsome, active, strong boyfriend was reduced to a 103.5-degree mass of green-gray flesh piled on my couch.

Now, I'm not going to grumble about men when they are sick. Women commonly complain men are big babies when they fall ill. I won't say that because I am the world's worst whiner when I'm sick. So I have no place to judge men.

My man, Jeremiah, was a brave little soldier. He's just lucky I have been a mommy for much longer than I've been his girlfriend. At the first sign of a fever, my body kicked into high Mommy Mode.

There were cool washcloths, clear liquids and lots of TLC. I called into work for him explaining his illness. Medication times were exact and temperatures were taken at periodic intervals. Before I left for work, he was turned, fluffed, medicated and hydrated.

This was just day one.

By the end of day three, my patience was running thin ,and the Mommy Mode was weakening. I had two papers due and two exams within two days. I had to find time to study amid the fever and cough.

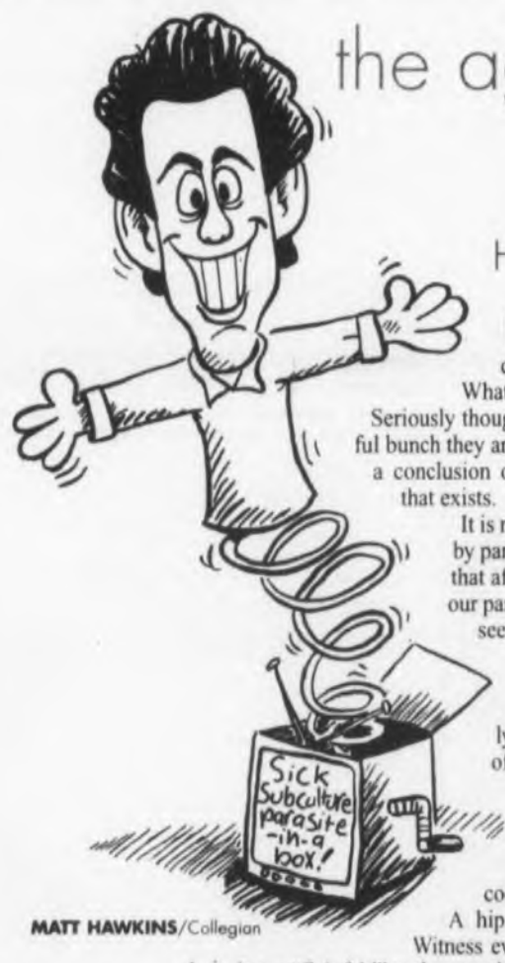
My apartment was a disaster. It looked like an inner-city hospital emergency room had collided with a laundromat mat and a school bus. Medication, dirty clothes and textbooks were everywhere.

And I missed Jeremiah. Sure, he was still there, sweaty and pale on the couch. But, we hadn't talked in three days. We hadn't cuddled or had dinner together. We hadn't gone to the store together or complained about work or school to each other.

The most intimate thing we had done during the course of his illness was have a quiet conversation while trying to bring his fever down by putting him in a tub of cool water. Trust me on this one, a grown man incoherently whining about cold water while you sit on the bathroom floor is not romantic.

ADRIAN FLEMING/Collegian

I was beginning to feel the pangs of resentment.



Then I remembered Superman and the people I work with. Soon the resentment was replaced by waves of guilt for feeling the resentment.

The actor who played Superman in the movies, Christopher Reeve, is paralyzed from the neck down from a horseback-riding accident a few years ago. His condition requires taxing care around the clock. He will never walk again; he will never help vacuum or do the dishes. Reeve and his wife will never again cuddle on the couch to watch their favorite TV show together. Yet, throughout this entire ordeal his wife has been by his side at every function he attends, every interview he does.

I work at the Riley County Seniors' Service Center. I know older adults who have had to take care of a spouse because of disease or illness. Continuous arduous care I cannot even imagine: bathing, feeding, dressing, everything. Some of their spouses have suffered from Alzheimer's or other illness where not only is the body weak but the mind as well. These devoted spouses continue this unselfish care, often for years.

To care for someone for the rest of their lives in that manner — that is true love. How could I be so childish and even slightly begrudge caring for the man I love for just a few days? I'm lucky. He'll be his normal, active, independent self again in just a few days.

Someday we will all grow old or, the gods forbid, meet with a terrible accident. Let us pray someone will be there who loves us enough to care for us in that way. Let us pray we each find someone we love enough to care for unconditionally. My weekend with the flu is over. I would do it again. I guess I can stop praying.

MATT HAWKINS/Collegian

the age of Cynicism

Has our society has lost all its soul and spirituality?

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

RUSSELL FORTMEYER is a senior in architectural engineering. You can e-mail comments to Russell at (rmf@ksu.edu).

Our generation is often referred to as cynical.

Whatever that means.

Seriously though, our parents' generation — the thoughtful bunch they are — question why we would arrive at such a conclusion of cynicism toward practically everything that exists.

It is not necessarily the way we have been raised by parents, it is the environment in which we live that affects our cynicism so profoundly. And it is our parents' generation that now controls what we see, buy, read and, for all intents and purposes, think.

The generations of people who have controlled society since 1945 have slowly increased the so-called "dumbing down" of society.

It might have started with tract homes and plastic everything, but it has evolved into a television-mad culture of consumers searching for the next cool thing.

A hip consciousness has pervaded in society. Witness everything from the popularity of the soulless sitcom "Seinfeld" to the crowds waiting for tables at ersatz theme and nostalgia restaurants. Sarcasm and irony replace the real and the spiritual.

I'm not arguing that Jerry Seinfeld isn't funny, but his humor has no redeeming value. His show is not a model of society, but of a sick subculture of parasites that live off the fruits of others. Seinfeld's best and worst contribution to society is the reinforcement of a feeling of being in the know — knowing something your colleagues do not.

It is a postmodern irony that is sorely out of date in many circles of intelligentsia, save a few uninspired artists, TV writers and architects. It's almost been completely exorcised from contemporary thought because of its ultimately unsatisfying, pessimistic effect on the individual.

Maybe in our quick-fix, instant-oatmeal culture, "Seinfeld" represents the unattainable high point for many Americans.

With superficial sitcom celebrities taking on the most importance in society, the other end of the spectrum is roundly filled out by the intelligentsia — the artists, the philosophers, the writers and the professionals. When one of them crosses over to popular culture, like a Maya Angelou, they are hailed for their brilliant efforts.

In Angelou's case, you have to make an "Oprah" appearance before you can really begin to sell the books.

The easiest example to illustrate this national problem is the movie industry.

Since I was born, the movie industry has slowly split itself into two separate entities serving two distinct categories of consumers, with a few gray areas.

It was the late 1970s when the mega-movies ("Jaws" and "Star Wars") took the industry into big money and product tie-ins. Although, to say movies are fueled by product tie-ins now seems tired.

The industry is now split between big-budget studio system, monoconcept movies and a small fringe of art films, either foreign or domestic, that either break out or drift into video store anonymity. The Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences has only recently come to realize the dastardly state of the industry.

The parallel between the movie industry and the anti-intelligentsia split of culture is now clear.

Yet, our generation, which has thrived off this societal split since birth, can now begin to take the authority to address this issue ourselves. Be it simple or bold, many attitudes we have toward our culture can drastically affect change.

Young people are beginning to reject the suburban culture that continues to tear away the threads of urban centers.

As close as Kansas City, our generation is singlehandedly revitalizing historic residential districts and making the moneyed classes revisit inner, urban development by moving into the city.

However, popular entertainment may prove the most deceptive foe.

As long as parents continue to satisfy their children's need of consumerism and their own materialistic urges, the larger society will continue its culturally destructive ways.

This country needs a political visionary — not some old geezer like Bill Bennett preaching from an ivory tower by moving into the city — to push for slow rejections of silly television and movies, industry-created music and unstoppable suburban sprawl.

It also takes little things, like watching specific TV programs instead of flipping on the tube to surf can improve one's quality of life. Or patronizing small businesses at the expense of multinational conglomerates.

Who will lead the march for a renewed spiritualism?

Who will stop the encroaching, all-consuming hipness?

Candidates present plans to provide students with clear vision of K-State improvements

President

Otto

Vice president

Knedlik

K-Staters deserve the best. Otto and Knedlik want to provide K-State students with a clear vision, honest decisions and sincere actions.

Many important new and continuing issues will face students in 1997-98. Some issues faced by student government were not created overnight and require continued effort to solve.

Aaron Otto, senior in political science and business, and Amy Knedlik, junior in accounting and finance, will continue to support these programs and will also meet the new challenges which lie ahead.

Some of these challenges include publishing teacher and course information, increasing campus safety, enhancing classroom equipment and technology, increasing accessibility of elected officials along with participation and interest in student government and maintaining affordable tuition and fees.

Making teacher and class information more accessible to the public: This year we presented a Public Teacher Information proposal to Faculty Senate and the Board of Regents.

Otto and Knedlik will work for the implementation of this proposal and the creation of a permanent program which will make extensive and meaningful information about instructors and courses accessible to all students.

This information would help students make better decisions about education and would be beneficial to advisers as they assist students in planning class schedules. Public teacher information is closer to being a reality than it was a year ago. With our continued efforts, a public teacher information program could be in place by next spring.

Maintaining a commitment to campus safety: We will continue to build on the success of this year. We have been able to receive $40,000 in new funding for campus lighting next year.

Our campus will benefit from the addition of at least three new security cameras this year. We are working on improving awareness of the campus escort service, Wildcat Walk. We will attempt to increase funding, expand the service area, and move the service to a more centrally located building on campus.

This will increase the available volunteers and make usage of the service more convenient. We are committed to providing a safe campus environment.

We believe improvements are necessary in the amount and quality of classroom equipment and technology.

Computer availability and science lab equipment are areas which need to be improved. Adequate resources should be available for students.

This project should be funded by the state. We will push for setting up an allocations process that allows students' voices and concerns to be heard throughout the decision making process so money is spent where it is most needed.

DENNIS LEVENE, custodial crew supervisor at Jardine Terrace, has been etching on glass and mirrors for the last 20 years. Levene etched the Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon logo on a mirror in Rusty's Outback seven years ago.

custodial crew supervisor crafts fine art by creating lasting impressions

ETCHED IN GLASS

CLAUDETTE RILEY
news editor

Not unlike a great tattoo artist, an etcher can customize lasting impressions through a specialized acid-washing procedure on glass or mirrors.

The handiwork of one such craftsman can be seen in restaurants and businesses all over Manhattan.

Dennis Levene, custodial crew supervisor at Jardine Terrace, became interested in this art form more than 20 years ago.

"I got started in the Marine Corps. I saw someone doing this and asked if they could teach me," Levene said. "It's a specialty. No one else does it."

The majority of Levene's work has been generated from the imagination of his clientele.

"I have over 200 patterns, and they vary from cartoon characters to Harley pictures and from religious to anything you want," Levene said. "People can give you their own thoughts. I tell people if you can draw it, I can etch it no matter how detailed it is."

Levene, who is licensed through K-State to use its logos, often gets asked to put Wildcat symbols on water pitchers, beer mugs and margarita and wine classes. He is working on similar items for Mr. P's Party Outlet.

His most popular gift item is long-stem roses or double-hearts with names etched inside to signify love or friendship.

Levene has also tackled larger projects.

"The first thing I did in Manhattan was in Rusty's Last Chance Outback," he said.

He was eventually recruited to etch on the Fishbowl's front door, the front glass in Cactus Jack's and plates containing scenery from the 1920s and 1930s between booths in the now defunct Old Chicago Bar & Grill.

His work also appears on the door of Barry's Drug Center on Poyntz Avenue.

Designs on car windows are a rare request for Levene.

"I warn people to make sure they want the pattern on their car windows because it's permanent," he said. "The only way to get it off is to break the window."

Costs for most projects range between $15-$50, depending on the size and amount of detail.

"If it was left to me, I would do it for the cost of the materials," Levene said.

Although he can spend up to three hours each evening working on projects, Levene insists glass etching is just a hobby.

"This is a hobby because it's fun. If you make it into a job, it isn't fun anymore," he said.

Law denies guns to domestic abusers

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Federal law enforcement officials are bracing for an inundation of phone calls from domestic-abuse victims who want guns taken away from their abusers.

A measure prohibiting gun ownership by people convicted of misdemeanor domestic violence was passed by Congress last year.

The Treasury Department's Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms is enforcing it.

"In almost every state, ATF is going to be the enforcement arm of first resort, because there is no state law" lifting firearms from those abusers, agency Director John Magaw told the House Appropriations subcommittee that oversees the Treasury Department.

The agency may not have the personnel to carry out all these investigations, he said Tuesday, and that could create problems.

"If we don't do it and someone gets killed as a result of it, we might be left holding the bag," Magaw said. "I don't know if you want ATF to handle these cases, but I don't know how we get out of it."

Declining to predict how many calls the agency will get, Magaw said, "We need to make sure we're doing what this committee wants us to do on this."

Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., chairman of the subcommittee, said he hoped ATF would not simply arrest people found to be wrongfully owning guns but would warn them of the new law first. He also expressed concern that the law could have significant budgetary effects.

Closer to home, about 10 law enforcement officers in the Treasury Department have lost their gun-carrying rights because of the law, Raymond Kelly, Treasury's undersecretary for enforcement, told the panel.

The measure, sponsored by Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., initially exempted law enforcement personnel, but that was taken out by Rep. Bob Barr, R-Ga. Barr, with support from the Fraternal Order of Police, is now seeking to have the law repealed.

Enforcement of the law is complicated by the fact that not all states have crime databases that include misdemeanor domestic violence, Kelly said.

The government is developing computerized databases to enable instant checks of backgrounds before handgun sales are allowed, an evolution of the Brady Law requiring five-day waits for background checks until instant checks are operable.

Kolbe said he was concerned about differences among states as to what misdemeanor domestic violence entails.

But Kelly said, "I'm not certain there is that wide disparity," and said he believed the threshold for conviction for such a misdemeanor was relatively high.

SpringDance '97 competition still open; all majors enouraged to apply for program

YVONNE PEARSON
staff reporter

SpringDance '97 is not limited to dance majors.

"One of the things about our program is that we don't limit it to just our senior advanced students or even to our majors," Luke Kahlich, production coordinator for SpringDance, said. "We have total open auditions. These people are from every college in the University. It gives them a lot of outlets for their energy."

Forty-nine students were chosen to perform. Choreography will be done by K-State dance faculty, Kahlich, Vera Orlock and Joyce Yagerline.

There will be three ballet pieces, a large group piece and two classical solos. SpringDance '97 will also feature modern dance pieces and a theater jazz piece.

Some of the dancers said they had little or no experience before auditioning.

"I didn't have much experience when I tried out," Chad Fullington, junior in elementary education, said. "But I think that I'm going to learn a lot about dance in general, like how it's programmed up to everything that goes into it."

Kahlich said he is putting together a piece that he calls "Whoever Can Be There on a Wednesday Night."

He said it is named that because that is when the dancers will rehearse it.

"Everyone who wanted to perform is in this piece," Kahlich said. "It's for everyone, from those who just walked up the stairs, to people who have a lot of training."

Students who did not get a chance to audition still will have a chance.

Jo Byrnes Miller, K-State dance alumna, will have auditions March 10.

She will create a modern dance piece with K-State students for SpringDance '97.

Another part of SpringDance '97 is the second annual fundraising dinner. It will be at Ristorante Marco Polo. The restaurant will serve food from its former French menu for the occasion.

The Roni Mahler award will be presented at the dinner. It will be given to someone who has the few knuckleheads on either side that don't like blacks or don't like whites who you sometimes have to deal with."

BEING THE MINORITY

Hicks said living in an environment where he doesn't share the same cultural background as the rest of the black students is difficult.

"I feel like I'm in a no-win situation, where I'm not going to fit in anywhere, no matter where I might go," Hicks said. "You find blacks few and far between. When you do have a chance to talk with them, you're so used to living in a white cultural environment that it's hard to relate to them and talk about experiences in college like you should be able to."

Even with other white students, he finds an invisible barrier.

In the middle of a serious conversation with a white friend, the student turned to Hicks and said, "You know, Will, you don't act like the typical black guy."

The racial barrier hit him like a wall, he said, nearly taking him out of his seat.

"I was shocked," Hicks said. "He didn't really know what a real black person was if he's going to stereotype a person to act a certain way. But everyone does that."

There are times, Hicks said, when he feels uncomfortable among a white majority. It is often in unforeseen situations like leaving his morning shower that the barrier reappears. He said he wonders if in a black environment people would tell him he didn't need to brush his short hair.

"It's nothing about me not liking the house," Hicks said, "but although I'm a part of the house, I'm still outside looking in."

Like the time when he was interested in a white girl at a party. With Tupac piercing the smoke-filled air with vicious lyrics, Hicks thought for sure the barrier was dissolved until someone said to him, "Will, she's white. You're black. That doesn't work."

Scott dedicates time outside the classroom to staying physically fit by lifting weights.

He also favors playing basketball to braving the Aggieville night life because he concluded that bars mean trouble.

"I try to stay out of the 'Ville. Plus, socially, I wasn't able to meet people there I felt comfortable around," he said.

STATEROOM SEGREGATION

On any given day when Scott and Hicks and hundreds of students and faculty visit the Union Stateroom, the sad truth, they said, remains evident: K-State is still segregated.

Scott re-creates the daily scene in the tranquility of his apartment, gesturing to where different ethnic groups congregate in the cafeteria setting: to the front left side are African Americans and behind them are the Asians, then the Hispanics.

"If you walk all the way to the other side of the Union, mostly everyone is fraternities and sororities of Caucasians," Scott said. "It's total separation. Manhattan isn't your typical salad bowl. It's not the multicultural setting it sets itself up to be. People do get along, but there's still a lot of work to be done as far as mentalities, as far as reaching out and meeting people that are of a different ethnic group."

Although Hicks sits with his fraternity brothers, he sometimes wants to sit with other blacks. He said he wonders what they think when he walks past them each day.

"I would really like to sit in that section," Hicks said. "I don't have any friends over there. I'd rather have more whites in the black section, but there's not. There's nothing you can do. It's got to be a group effort."

Switzer said companionship and personal acquaintance comes from relationships built in the classroom.

"If that bond doesn't already exist, it's not going to be initiated there (in the Stateroom)," Switzer said. "You'd rather sit where you know someone."

Chiquita Hishaw, sophomore in pre-nursing, sits in the front left side of the Stateroom almost daily. She said it's because she sees other blacks sitting there.

"It's bad," she said. "Sometimes white people will come over here and sit, but they're really cautious because they know black people are there. I think it's stupid."

Darrol Walker, senior in visual communications, said he doesn't pay attention to the situation.

"A majority of us sit here because it's closer to get out," Walker said. "You can see people coming and going. It's not that we don't let people come sit with us. I don't know. Union 101 is a trip."

Julie Lindamood, junior in public relations, is a product of mixed racial ancestry.

She said having both black and white friends, she feels the pull by both cultures to conform. Although she doesn't like the separation, she said Stateroom segregation is something students do on their own because blacks, and fraternity and sorority members just feel more comfortable in their separate environments.

Despite the separation in the Stateroom, Scott said friendship should always have no boundaries.

"You have to figure out who you feel comfortable, with and that's who you need to hang out with — the people you feel comfortable with, the people you feel are your true friends," Scott said. "When you find a true friend, that's who you should spend your time with, no matter what color they are."

Pro-life groups target teens outside school

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NORTH BERGEN, N.J. — Pro-life advocates targeted teen-agers by showing them pictures of bloody and dismembered fetuses outside high schools across the nation.

"We think the photographs speak loudly enough," William Koehler, director of Project Awareness, said.

Monday was the first day of the campaign by Operation Rescue to bring "God back to school" and focus its pro-life efforts on youngsters. Protests were planned in 100 cities.

"We have tried the school boards," Operation Rescue Director Flip Benham, said. "We have tried the courts. We have tried the legislators, and now we are going to the schools to take them back and bring them home."

Students had strong reactions to the pictures.

"I think it's just sick to see something like that," said Angie Grant, a ninth grader at Abraham Lincoln High School in Denver. "Seeing what those mothers are doing to their babies, it's just not something I would do."

In Melbourne, Fla., activists covered their fetus picture, saying they wanted to be sensitive to parents and students.

"This is a place of education, and we shouldn't be bombarded like this," junior Tenesha Martin, 16, said. "Abortion is a serious issue, and they act like it's an easy decision for a woman."

Some students at North Bergen, N.J., High School spoke with the seven demonstrators, while others engaged one another in abortion debates.

"It's gruesome, but people see what's going on," Adrian Taboas, 17, who opposes abortion, said. "I don't like seeing it because that's messed up, but it shows something so kids know, 'Oh my God, that's going to happen to my baby if I give it up.' It should have an effect."

Chris Fabiano, 17, disagreed.

"It's disgusting," Fabiano said. "We have little kids coming to this school for day-care programs and stuff like that, and when they see this, what are they going to think? It's not right to do it at any high school."

Protests were also reported at schools in the Southern California communities of Beverly Hills and Santa Monica; Cleveland; Spokane,

CAT ATTACK AT THE BIG 12 TOURNAMENT

With a season of 16 wins and 10 losses, the women's basketball team surprised fans.

They are doing it again. This time it's big time.

In the inaugural Big 12 Tournament, the Wildcats cleared a path around the Sooners with

TEAM DOMINATION

STORY BY SUN DEE MILLS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — It was K-State all the way. The Cats soundly defeated the Oklahoma Sooners 81-56 in their first Big 12 Tournament game.

Coach Deb Patterson said she was concerned about stepping up and executing offense against the Sooners after their last meeting Feb. 8, where the Cats scored only 49 points to the Sooners' 47.

"In this OU game, we felt it was important to establish ourselves offensively," Patterson said. "I was real pleased with the team's ability to attack the OU defense."

Junior guard Brit Jacobson started the game, and added an extra defensive edge early with a steal and the first basket.

Patterson said Jacobson's start and freshman center Angie Finkes on the bench were match-up issues with the Oklahoma lineup.

"We needed some experience and quickness on the perimeter, and Brit gives that to us," Patterson said. "Angie Finkes has been playing well for us, and she came in off the bench today."

Finkes came in at the 12:35 mark and scored off an offensive board within 20 seconds. She came away with 11 points and five boards in the game.

Senior forward and all-Big 12 first team member Andria Jones' first score did not come until five minutes into the game. When it appeared, it was an over-the-shoulder jumper Sooner coach Sherri Coale said her team had been watching out for.

"Andria Jones is a great player," Coale said. "She's got an up-and-over post move that, if it gets going, can be bad."

For the third time this season, Jones was not the leading scorer. A season-high five players posted double figures against the Sooners. Patterson said the Cats' performance was simply good basketball.

"When this team plays its best basketball, this team is balanced across the board," Patterson said. "I can't fault one player with not wanting the ball in this game."

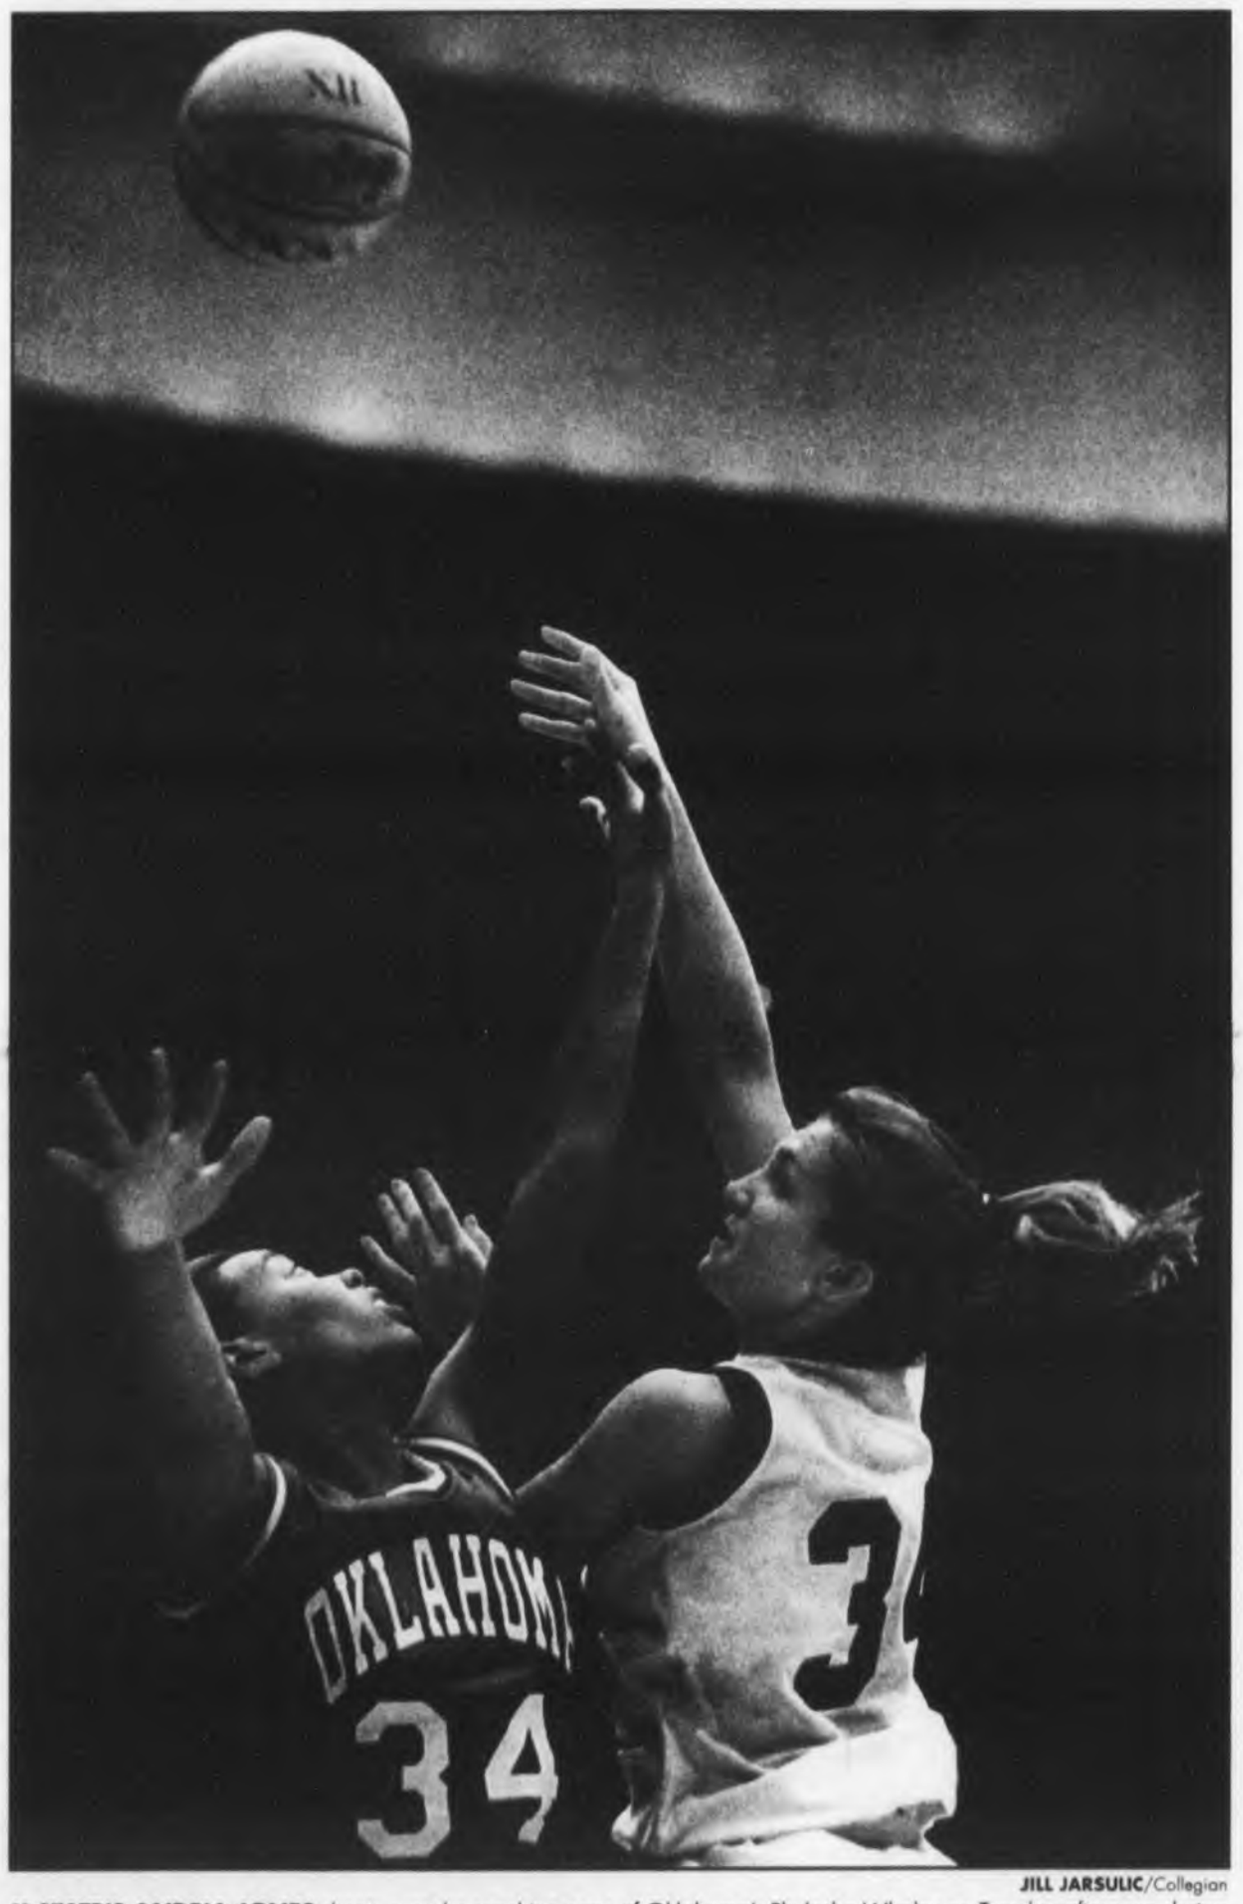
The Sooners stayed with the Cats for the first five minutes of the game, which Patterson said was a result of the two teams feeling each other out initially.

"They were getting good looks against our defense, and I was concerned with our need to make defensive adjustments," Patterson said.

With 7:25 left in the first half, the Cats went on a 10-0 run that put 18 points between the two teams. Into halftime, the Cats were up 40-26, and the Sooners shot a low 33 percent from the field. Patterson said she attributed the team's success to its defensive efforts, something the team had focused on since the Baylor loss last Saturday.

"I was pleased with the way we played defense," Patterson said. "We were coming off a bad defensive showing against Baylor, so we needed to get some steals, and we needed to do good on our defensive boards."

The Cats recorded 13 steals, three each by Jacobson and senior guard Kjersten Larson. The Sooners had only four.



Senior point guard Missy Decker sparked the opening of the second half with two three-pointers within two minutes. After struggling with shooting for the past few games, Decker said it was good to make a few.

"I got some great looks," Decker said. "They were sagging inside, double- and triple-teaming on A.J., which opened up the perimeter."

Decker contributed 12 points behind the arc to the game, something Coale said opened a can of worms for the Sooners.

"We left Decker open, and she nailed some treys," Coale said. "We didn't stay with our game plan."

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — When it comes down to tournament time, teams tend to look to their seniors to step up and make contributions. K-State was no exception, as its four seniors contributed to a 81-56 win over Oklahoma in the first round of the Big 12 Tournament.

"We needed players on the floor that had significant experience and could give us some solid play," Cat coach Deb Patterson said.

Cat seniors Missy Decker, Andria Jones, Kayla Hester and Kjersten Larson combined for 36 of the team's points.

Leading the way for the Cats from the outside was Decker. After missing her first two three-point attempts, Decker connected on a trey at the 14:34 mark to give the Cats a one-point lead.

Decker's three-pointer at the 6:16 mark gave the Cats their biggest lead of the game, 25-14.

Decker continued her three-point parade in the second half, connecting on two bombs in the first three minutes. Decker finished the game with 12 points, four points better than her season average.

Coming into the game, Decker had been struggling from the field, especially

No. 1 Jayhawks just toying with teams in early part of season

VIEWPOINT

JEREMY KELLEY

JEREMY KELLEY is a sophomore in print journalism. You can e-mail your comments to Jeremy at (weasal1@ksu.edu).

It's finally here.

The greatest time of the year is finally here. A time when the word "upset" isn't such a bad thing. A time when all you see on ESPN are mad basketball highlights.

That's right. It's tournament time, but before that kicks off, we get to see some of the premiere basketball teams in the country in Kansas City this weekend.

This year marks an unprecedented event in college basketball — the inaugural Big 12 Tournament.

I, for one, get to witness the madness firsthand.

Not only that, but I also get to witness KU wallop every team that proceeds to trample on the same ground as the famed Jayhawks.

There's not a team in the conference, let alone the country, who can hold a candle to the No. 1 team in the nation that resides in Lawrence.

And, you know, it's almost funny.

This team has just been toying with every opponent so far this season. There hasn't been a game this year where KU has been in trouble with the exception of the Missouri game, but then again KU always has trouble in the Hearnes Center.

But take a trip back in time with me to earlier in the season.

Against No. 4 Cincinnati on Dec. 4, the Hawks toyed with the Bearcats, appearing to be rattled, unfocused and haggard.

The operative word there is appearing.

After trailing by as many as 16 in the game to the Bearcats, KU thought it was time to take control over the game, and that's exactly what they did, erasing the Bearcats' lead and outscoring Cincy by 19 in the second half to take the game, 72-65.

Oh, you want more?

The Hawks squared off with Connecticut on Jan. 11 in what every sportswriter-type was predicting as KU's first loss of the year.

Gugh!

Again playing patty-cake with its opponents, KU let the Huskies spurt out to the early lead taking a 23-7 lead seven minutes into the contest.

The Hawks then responded with a 14-0 run that got them within two, but allowed the Huskies to take the slim halftime lead, 34-31.

Playa', playa' blew up!

KU, the veteran team that it is, spurted out to a seven point lead to open the second half. The Huskies tied the game, yes, but again the Hawks let them, and KU went away with its 18th game in a row, 73-65.

Want another?

I, for one, predicted KU to lose its first game of the year at Texas Tech on Jan. 29, but that didn't happen.

Ya see, KU is the only basketball team in the country that can spurt wherever and whenever they want to and, as the season has proven, no one can stop them.

Down by 16 in the first half in Lubbock, and even by that many in the second, KU blitzed the Red Raiders via a 19-3 run and found themselves up by five with seven minutes left. KU won the game, 86-77.

Maybe the word is monkeying. I am not sure. Maybe KU's motto will help explain how they play: "You trip with me, now it's a must that a trip with you."

Still not satisfied?

Well, how about one closer to home, with our very own K-State Wildcats.

Remember the Senior Day game in Lawrence a few weeks ago? The last team in the Big 12 had a one-point lead on the No. 1 team in the nation.

Yeah, the Cats played a heck of a first half, but then the usual occurred in the second half.

Can you say dallying?

Just face it. Nobody can hang with Roy's boys — they're too good. The Hawks blew the gates wide open against K-State. They just toy with people because they know they are the best college basketball team in the history of Kansas basketball.

This list could go on and on and on. There's not a team in the country who can even remotely hang with the only grandeur team from Kansas.

Certainly the Hawks have had their problems in previous conference tournaments, but this is different. At times, they might appear to struggle, but just count on the Hawks to show some flavor and sweep through the inaugural Big 12 Tournament, just like butter.

x Tuesday afternoon, K-State treated the visiting Panthers from the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee to a double dose of Big 12 baseball.

After dropping a three game set to the Missouri Tigers last weekend, the Wildcats exhibited a change of pace by defeating the Panthers 5-4 and 10-3.

Coach Mike Clark said it was a good stepping stone toward getting back on track.

"We played well in the Missouri series," he said, "but it's nice to get the wins."

K-State improved its record to 7-4 overall, while Wisconsin-Milwaukee dropped to 1-6 on the season.

Scott Poepard had the hot bat in both games, going 2-4 in the first match with a double, and 3-3 in the second game with another double and his fourth home run of the season.

"We're just happy to get two wins," Poepard said.

"We needed these games."

Poepard's home run in the first inning was a line-drive shot to right field that took less time to leave the park than a Wildcat fan caught in Lawrence.

"I didn't know it was out," Poepard said. "I thought the outfielder caught it."

Jason Wells notched his second victory of the season going six innings, allowing six hits and three runs, while striking out three and walking three.

"Jason pitched well," Clark said. "He looked good."

Wells affirmed Clark's sentiments.

"I had some good defense behind me up the middle," Wells said. "Heath and J.D. played well — they turned a couple double plays."

The first game saw David Meares pick up his first victory of the season.

Heath Schesser drove home the winning run in the seventh inning to lift the Cats to the one run victory.

David Johnson pitched the ninth for his fifth save of the season, one shy of the single season record. He set the record last year with six.

Taking these two games in stride, Clark pointed to the past series to show better play.

"We're playing well," he said. "We improved on the things that we did wrong in the Missouri series."

K-State went deep into its roster for both games, playing everyone on the bench, including pitcher Pat Hertzel, who batted in the seventh for Poepard.

"We played a lot of players, and that's what we wanted to do," Clark said. "Those guys need playing time because they may be called on sometime down the road."

Clark also pointed out that starting positions are still up for grabs.

"That's why it's so important to get those guys some at bats," he said.

The Wildcats take to the road today to face Creighton at 2 p.m.

This weekend they play their first Big 12 road game of the season as they venture to Stillwater to take on Oklahoma State in a three-game series.

from behind the arc.

In her past six games, she was eight of 36 from the field. In her past three, she had connected on only one of 11 from three-point land.

"It really felt good to make a few at first," Decker said. "I hadn't been shooting that well in the last couple of games.

"I just had to step up and be confident, you cannot be gun shy at this point in the season."

Although Jones' numbers were limited offensively, her presence opened up the shots for Decker.

Constantly being double teamed down low, Jones finished the game with just 11 points, well below her 19.1 season average.

"They were just sagging down on A.J., and that really opened up the perimeter game for us," Decker said.

Jones' presence also opened up shots for Hester and Larson.

Hester finished the game three of six from the field, including one of two from three-point land.

Her seven points were the most she has recorded in the past four games.

Larson finished the game with a perfect 100 percent from the field, recording six points.

It was Larson's largest offensive output since the second game of the season against Bradley.

Despite the success of the Cats, these seniors know they cannot look too far ahead.

"Coming into the season, nobody expected us to do this good," Jones said. "We knew we had the potential to do this. Now we just have to take one game at a time."

GAME

After a timeout at the 11:23 mark, the Cats never led by less than 24 points.

The widest gap appeared after Jacobson sank the back half of a pair of free throws at the 7:27 mark, and the Cats were up 68-38.

With four minutes left in the game, Sooner guard Roxanne Long came alive and put three treys and a jumper into the basket, but the attempt came too late to make a dent in the solid Cat lead.

Coale said the Cats played like a team with something on the line.

"My congratulations to Deb Patterson and the Kansas State Wildcats," Coale said. "They played like a team trying to get into the NCAA Tournament, and I think they might have just done that with a win today."

Decker said they had taken the entire season one game at a time, and that would be the team's attitude regarding the tournament.

"We need to look to tomorrow and get ready for Tech and be prepared to play," Decker said.

Patterson said the Cats' defensive performance against the Texas Tech Red Raiders on Jan. 18 was not great and would be a focus for tomorrow's game at 2:20 p.m.

"We have to play a full 40 minutes," Patterson said.

"They have a great inside-outside attack, and great perimeter shooter in all-America candidate Alicia Thompson."

Thompson averages 24.2 points a game and posted a career-high 47 points against Texas Feb. 5.

Patterson said the tournament appearance was beyond the team's control at this point, and that a win against the Red Raiders would be terrific.

"We're sitting with 17 wins now," Patterson said. "Our main concern now is lining up against Texas Tech, a great team. We will come ready to play, and we'll work hard to get a win."

Rec Complex can assist in trimming up

STORY BY SARA EDWARDS • PHOTOS BY BRANDON WHITE

The rows of machines at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex might be paradise for a fitness junkie, but the average beginner might not know where to start.

Megan Theel, fitness consultant and senior in nutrition and exercise sciences and pre-physical therapy, said a person should take a tour of the facility to get an idea of what it offers.

A person can also schedule a free appointment with a fitness consultant. Fitness consultants can spend about an hour demonstrating how the equipment is used.

▶ Need more info? Want to schedule an appointment with a fitness consultant? Call the Rec Complex at 532-6950.

Deanna French, fitness consultant and senior in nutrition and exercise sciences, said Rec Complex users should give everything a try to see what they like. She said some people are afraid to try a machine because they are not exactly sure how it works.

"If they don't get attention or shown how to do it, they drop out," she said.

Weight room and fitness supervisors are stationed in the Rec Complex to enforce rules and ensure safety, but they can also help answer questions about equipment.

"If we're not there and someone doesn't know exactly how to use the machine, they should be able to show them," French said.

In addition to making people feel comfortable with the equipment, fitness consultants can also set up individual exercise programs and do fitness evaluations.

French said fitness consultants work with individuals to help them figure out their fitness goals and figure out an exercise program to help them achieve their goals.

Theel said they meet with a lot of first-time users.

"It's a good way to make sure that you're getting started on the right foot and getting the most out of your workout," she said.

Each individual's program will vary depending on fitness level, experience and goals.

Beginners can use just about any machine at the Rec Complex if they work out for a shorter time at a lower intensity. The level of intensity varies from person to person. It is important for people to start slow and work their way up.

Theel said a person should not work out so hard they can't carry on a conversation.

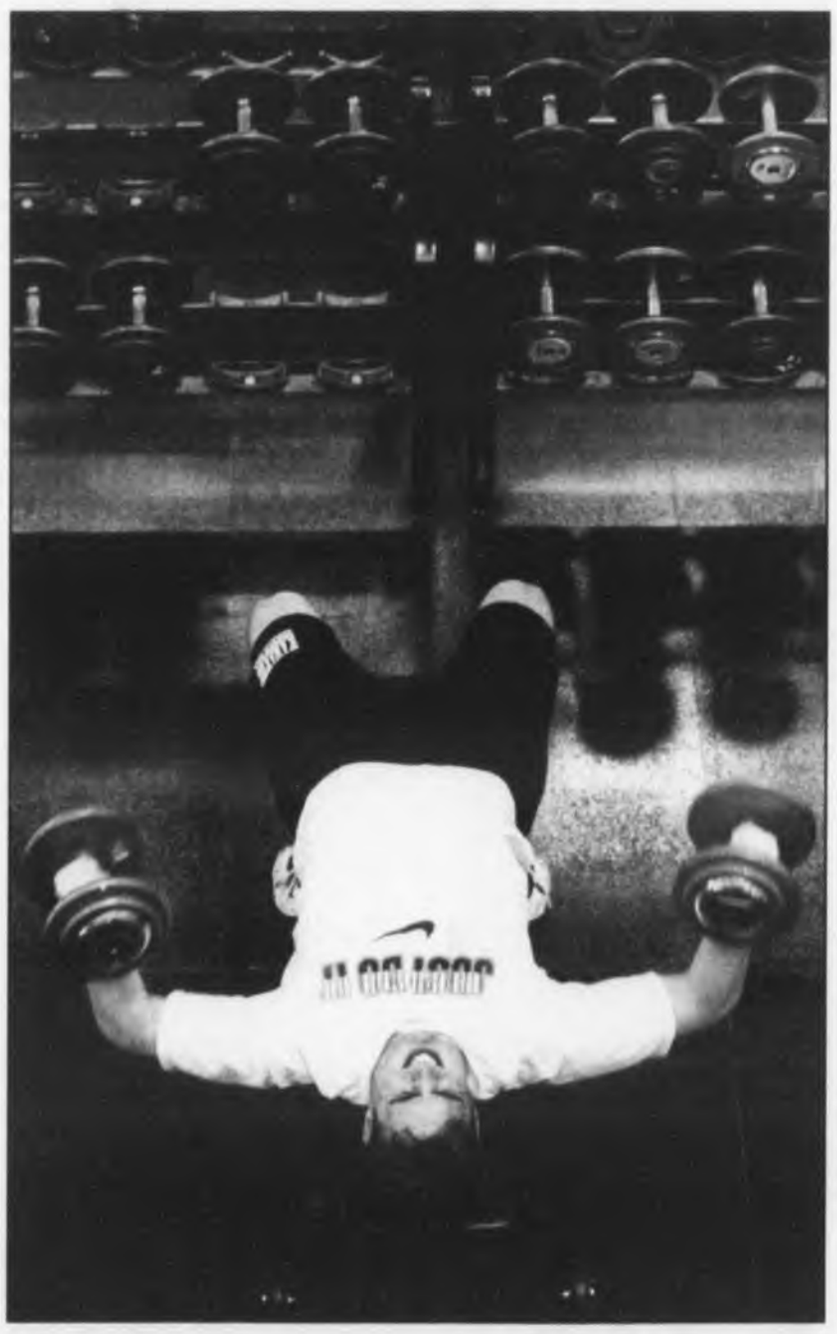
French said both cardiovascular and weight training are important. Some good equipment for beginners in the cardiovascular fitness room includes Stairmasters, stationary bikes and rowing machines.

Running, walking and aerobics classes are also good cardiovascular workouts.

French said people has to expend more calories than they take in if they want to loose weight.

The Rec Complex has weight machines and free weights. Weight machines on the upper level are set up for circuit training. There are three different courses from which to choose. The order to use the machines is posted on the wall.

"That is a good thing for people who don't have a lot of time on their hands," French said.



It is important to remember to warm up and cool down before and after working out. Stretching is another important part of the workout.

"It helps prevent injury and maintain flexibility. It's a good thing to do," Theel said.

She said a cardiovascular workout and abdominal exercises can be done every day, but people should wait a day before lifting weights with the same muscle group again. This gives the muscles time to recover.

French said it can help some people to bring a friend or take classes to keep themselves accountable for exercising.

"Just getting up and doing something is the most important thing for overall health," French said.

THE MANY USES OF COCKROACHES

Japanese researchers at Tokyo University and Tsukubc University said they will begin testing a project to surgically implant microprocessors and electrode sets, and eventually microcameras, into American cockroaches for a variety of possible missions, including espionage surveillance and searching for victims in earthquake rubble.

The equipment, which can also receive remote-control signals to command the cockroach's movements, weighs a tenth of an ounce, twice a typical roach's weight but still only a tenth of what it potentially can carry.

Program could offer safe rides home

CORY MORGAN
staff reporter

Students who drink at bars could easily get a sober ride home in the near future.

For nearly three years, Angie Jensen, senior in textiles, has worked on a program she hopes will benefit all students.

The program is Students Call A Ride (SCAR) and could be in effect the fall of 1998, depending on the amount of funding received.

The program is being designed to meet the needs of a designated-driving program for students.

SCAR would run Wednesday through Saturday, from 10:00 p.m. to 2:00 a.m., depending on funding.

If a student needs a ride home, they will call a number and give the dispatcher certain information, including name, Social Security number and place to be picked up. The driver will be notified by a dispatcher over a radio system and then pick up the students anywhere within the city limits of Manhattan.

The service would pick up students from the bar and take them directly home but not to any other bar or party, Jensen said.

"I think that the program will work," Jensen said. "It is like any other program. The more widely recognized the program is, the more people will use it."

SCAR would be a program operated by students, so students using the service will feel more comfortable when using the program, Jensen said.

In a 1995 survey, students indicated that they felt an on-call service was the best option for a program of this sort. The survey also noted that a large number of students said they would use the service.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said that he receives one or two creative ideas about bettering K-State's campus per week.

Bosco said SCAR is a neat idea, but as far as becoming a reality, the program has a long way to go. He said that meeting with Student Governing Association was a good start, but the process of funding and organizational structures are complex.

Jensen has spent three years working on this program and since last semester, she has spent three hours a day on it.

"I have worked a lot on this program lately because I feel we need to act responsibly as a student body," Jensen said. "According to statistics, 7.6 percent of students at K-State have been arrested for driving under the influence of alcohol."

Working with Jensen on the program are Jami Nelson, junior in mass communications, Amy Mashburn, junior in health professions program; and Aaron Donner, junior in business administration.

"The program is likely to be expanded to other services, besides just being picked up from the bars," Jensen said. "We just want to get the program started and then the expansion process will take care of itself."

SCAR would create jobs for students and one director on campus. The staff would consist of a director to take care of the finances and other responsibilities, and four drivers to pick up passengers.

There would also be a dispatcher to answer calls and relay information to drivers. Two vans would run each night, with four drivers working each night.

"In the long run, this service will save students money and their lives," Jensen said.

According to Jensen, the benefits of the program are that it would increase the road safety for the entire Manhattan community.

It would provide reliable alternative transportation and heightened awareness about the dangers of drinking and driving, develop long-term responsible decision making before and after consumption and create positive exposure to the University within the community.

Jensen said businesses would help fund some of the expenses, but not nearly enough to run the entire program.

Total expenses to start the program would be $29,785. To continue the program each year after the first, it would cost $23,895 a year.

Jensen said the program will benefit all students, even if they don't drink alcoholic beverages.

"If students are at a bar and aren't having a good time, they can use SCAR just as a ride home even if they were not drinking," Jensen said. "Bartenders can also use the service to call and get students who have had too much to drink a ride home."

2nd error found in KPL, KGE billing

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Kansas regulators have discovered another problem in the calculation of natural gas bills by KPL and KGE, two utilities owned by Topeka-based Western Resources Inc.

The error will probably affect far more than the 3,800 customers of the utilities who recently discovered they'd been overcharged.

The regulators said they discovered both utilities had been charging some customers a cost of gas figure before it was approved by the Kansas Corporation Commission.

The error may have been occurring for years, regulators say.

The KCC and the Customer Council, which is made up of Western Resources, the state regulatory agency and the Citizens Utility Ratepayer Board, have started an investigation to determine how many bills were miscalculated.

The previously discovered KPL and KGE overcharges were attributed to delays in reading some meters.

"This is definitely an additional problem and appears to be widespread," said Rosemary Foreman, a KCC spokeswoman.

KPL serves the northeast and the central parts of the state, including part of the Kansas City area. KGE serves parts of southern Kansas, including Wichita.

The latest revelations come on the heels of Friday's disclosure by Missouri Gas Energy that it had miscalculated 135,000 bills.

Missouri regulators were in Kansas City Monday to begin reviewing that utility, which serves western Missouri.

The new problem with KPL and KGE bills involves the cost of gas, often referred to as COG on utility bills, which is the wholesale price of gas plus transportation costs.

Once a month, utilities in Kansas adjust the cost of gas and use the figure to calculate that month's natural-gas bills.

The KCC must approve each cost-of-gas adjustment.

The commission's research found instances when KPL and KGE used a cost of gas figure before it was approved.

On Feb. 4 the commission approved a February cost of gas of $4.58 for 1,000 cubic feet, meaning that bills with statements dated Feb. 4 or later should have been charged that figure.

But KPL and KGE began charging some customers at that rate on statements dated Feb. 3 and earlier.

Customers affected appeared to be in billing cycles in which their meters were supposed to be read at the end of the month.

Every bill is given a statement date, processed and, usually, mailed a few days after the meter is read.

Because the cost of natural gas has soared in recent months, it is important to know which month's cost of gas was used to calculate a bill.

The regulatory commission also found that two customer bills from consecutive months used the same month's cost of gas, which isn't supposed to happen.

Western spokeswoman Michel Philipp noted that using the wrong cost of gas figure could cause the bill to decline, if the cost of gas was going down.

The disclosure of a second billing problem suggested some intrinsic problems in KGE and KPL's billing system, and Philipp said, "We need to take the weaknesses and shore them up," she said.

Cloning raises mixed opinions

BECKY WINTER
staff reporter

The recent cloning of animals has caused the K-State campus to take a second look at this technological monkey business.

"Cloning from the biological perspective has been going on for millions of years with plants," Jerry Weis, associate professor of biology, said. "Its application to humans is the real question."

Donald Roufa, professor of biology, said he agrees that the potential use for human cloning is nothing but double trouble.

"It's one thing to do it with a sheep. It is totally different to do this with a man," Roufa said.

While it seems clear that human cloning is problematic, the advantages to non-human cloning could have many positive effects on genetic research, Roufa said.

"Cloning provides an outstanding research system for understanding the process of mammalian development because the cloned original shares 100 percent of their genetic information," Roufa said.

"I think this type of research will be extremely useful in understanding birth defects and creating treatments for them," he said.

"It's a huge leap in the field of genetic research," Josh Render, freshman in biology, said. "I think right now it is heading in a positive direction and could help the research field quite a bit."

Others said they are skeptical about the prospect of cloning.

"It needs to be strongly regulated. That's basically what Hitler wanted, and if some idiot gets that in his head, it is going to be a real problem," Teresa O'Leary, junior in microbiology, said.

Roufa said he agrees that the process needs to be seriously considered when dealing with human cloning.

"If you take the word cloning out and just talk about human experimentation in general, it cannot legally be done, because there are strict laws against it. In terms of the ethical and legal climate, cloning for humans is very unlikely," Roufa said.

In the long run, Weis said he thinks that the potential negative effects will continue to outweigh the industry's curiosity.

"As a scientist, one is always interested in the what-if questions, but intellectual curiosity is not a compelling reason to go through with this on humans," Weis said.

humanity," Clinton said. "Each human life is unique, born of a miracle that reaches beyond laboratory science. I believe we must respect this profound gift and resist the temptation to replicate ourselves."

Current law prohibits spending federal money on human embryo experiments, but the prohibition expires Sept. 30. Sen. Christopher Bond, R-Mo., has urged Congress to make that ban permanent.

Those restrictions, however, did not explicitly address cloned embryos, nor did they apply to all federal agencies, so Clinton moved to close that loophole.

"Science often moves faster than our ability to understand its implications," Clinton said. "Any discovery that touches upon human creation is not simply a matter of scientific inquiry. It is a matter of morality and spirituality as well."

Clinton also asked private researchers — who are not covered by his directive — to voluntarily hold off at least until the National Bioethics Advisory Commission can study the matter, a move with which biological and medical researchers agreed.

"It's a wise idea to call a time-out. This has happened a bit sooner than people expected," said Carl Feldbaum, president of the Biotechnology Industry Organization, a group representing those involved in health care, agricultural and environmental research.

However, they also warned the president that making his ban permanent could thwart vital research on how genes are turned on and off inside human cells, a key factor in finding a cure for cancer or some birth defects.

"We mustn't shut down other related forms of research that could unlock the secrets to diseases," said Ronald M. Green, director of the Ethics Institute at Dartmouth College and a member of a 1994 panel on human embryo research at the National Institutes of Health.

Clinton, too, noted the difference cloning could make in agriculture, medical treatments or helping to unlock secrets of the genetic code. But, he said, he did not want scientific progress to move so fast that new developments are not handled responsibly.

"This is a discovery that carries burdens as well as benefits," Clinton said. "That is why we have a responsibility to move with caution and care.

"How can we get the benefits of our deep desire to find any possible cure for any malady that's out there, without raising the kind of ethical implications that, in effect, we're in the business where people are trying to play God?"

Researchers said they created the monkey clones with the goal of making research cheaper and more efficient. They said they have no desire to reproduce a human double.

SGA

In the legislative branch, Student Senate's largest responsibility is the maintenance of student fees and the funding of student groups. While these issues are always a priority, Senate has also developed a reputation for creating resolutions attempting to influence issues as diverse as campus construction to state government proposals to commendations to students and faculty.

The other powers of the executive and legislative branches of SGA are mainly through appointments to campus committees and other entities requiring student input. The president nominates and the Senate passes appointments, much like Washington.

Each new body of Senate and each new president can take these powers and set a tone for the year. But how effectively have recent leaders used their powers?

What image does K-State's SGA present to lawmakers? To the administration? To faculty? To students?

Hansen, whose term will expire in less than three weeks, came to SGA with a handful of expectations, many of which have changed over the year.

"I knew as president and vice president you had a chance to effect change on some issues," Hansen said. "I didn't know how relevant SGA was for other government groups like the Board of Regents."

Hansen said he thinks SGA draws its main power from its control over student fees that are committed to various campus resources, like the K-State Student Union.

On policy issues, however, Hansen said he thinks SGA can be at a disadvantage.

"There's a lot of times we don't have the time, resources or manpower to keep up with the administration," he said. "A lot of times, you are asked to compete with legislative staffs and Board of Regents' staffs. If we have people in SGA who are excited about issues, we will have those resources to keep up."

Another factor for effectiveness is the yearly term limits for presidents and senators.

Taking the faculty evaluation proposal as an example, Hansen said it has taken the year just to reach a philosophical agreement, let alone orchestrate the finer details of funding and management of the proposal.

"It's extremely frustrating," he said. "As an officer, you have to let everyone around in on the process so when you leave, someone else has a stake in it."

Hansen said he thinks SGA is perceived well by faculty, state leaders and the regents, but sometimes is not appreciated by students.

On visitations, Hansen said many student groups are very excited about issues, but others don't care.

"I think people are frustrated because I don't think we do a very good job of reaching out to campus," he said. "I think people feel disconnected from the issues, and that's what leads to the apathy.

"Times are good, so there's just not a general sense of urgency."

Sue Peterson, assistant to President Jon Wefald for governmental relations, said she sees SGA as a respected representation of K-State students.

Peterson said any time K-State and the University of Kansas can get together on an issue, the situation can be improved.

"When you get everyone in the system together — which is about 80,000 students — I think it makes a big impact," Peterson said. "We try to do things as a system and anytime you do things as a system it works better in the legislature."

Peterson said although it would be nice for student leadership to have more consistency, it is important for students to remain active in state issues, whether that be in the legislature or with the Student Advisory Committee to the regents.

"I still believe students and parents are the taxpayers, and they write the checks for the University, and the legislature realizes that and listens to them," she said.

Many different issues can affect students, and state issues do not always get as much attention.

"Sometimes I think federal issues are more important — like loans and grants," she said. "Students are probably more interested in state issues, but have a harder time figuring out how the state issues affect them."

Peterson works with students on the University Relations committee and with SGA's Governmental Relations committee.

"I have never found them to be a puppet of the administration, because there are disagreements," she said.

Dear friends:

Two students have developed a thorough understanding of Kansas State University, both inside and outside of student government. They both harbor a deep purple pride and we enthusiastically support them for Student Body President and Vice President. Who are we talking about? Aaron Otto and Amy Knedlik. We want to share with you our reasons for supporting the Otto/Knedlik ticket.

Aaron Otto, a senior in the College of Arts & Sciences, has a very thorough understanding of Student Senate and student government because of his experience as Student Body Vice President. He has a complete understanding of the legislative process in the City of Manhattan and the State of Kansas.

Amy Knedlik, junior in the College of Business Administration, has demonstrated her dedication and commitment to serving students both inside and outside of student government, through her experience as a Business Senator, Attorney General and other business activities. We have witnessed her visionary take-the-time-to-listen to you style of leadership firsthand.

Aaron & Amy are the best package for K-State's next Student Body Administration. They are committed to making teacher and course information public, enhancing campus safety and improving classroom technology and equipment. More importantly, they are well qualified student leaders with the ability to represent K-State students on all issues. Aaron Otto and Amy Knedlik will do just that.

Join us in supporting the best Student Body President and Vice President Ticket: OTTO/KNEDLIK.

Riley County Jail conditions hinder daily operations

▶ RILEY COUNTY'S only jail cannot house female inmates; lack of space causes inconveniences, security concerns.

STEVE WARE
staff reporter

Twenty-seven inmates live in a space designed for 14.

"That's the reality of overcrowding," Capt. Nick Edvy, supervisor of the Riley County Jail, said. "No place to put everybody."

Crowded cells are only part of the problem facing daily operations of the county's only incarceration facility. Officers have to deal with an aging building that poses security risks as well as inadequate equipment and a manpower shortage.

Plans for a new jail give hope to rectifying these problems, Edvy said, but they have needed to be fixed for a long time.

"These are real problems we have to remedy every day," Edvy said.

"We have a space problem," he said. "We have the jail here as well as the legal process department and evidence. There's not enough room here for all of that."

The jail only has facilities to house male inmates.

"We have to keep women completely out of sight of the men," Edvy said. "We can't do that here. We farm the women out to Junction City instead."

The jail's lack of space also poses security problems for officers.

"With all of the traffic we get through here for legal stuff and evidence, there's always a security breach. It's too easy to walk right in," he said. "We have our detoxification cell outside of the main complex. That puts officers at risk when they take someone from here to there. It needs to be inside."

He also said the inadequate facilities lead to logistical problems when activity at the jail increases.

"If someone comes for visitation or if a lawyer comes in, they use this room, but it's also our booking room," he said. "So, if we get a DUI in here or something, we have to get rid of the visitors so we can process the guy. We need to have holding cells. We don't have them."

Besides the lack of space, the jail is also understaffed, Edvy said.

"Right now we have 11 officers, but we need about seven more," he said. "There are officers that are doing two, three jobs or maybe more. When that happens they may not have time to go up and do a

The Random Student Organization does not like the way candidates are running their campaigns.

They have been removing campaign signs from the trees around campus.

An e-mail letter was sent to the Collegian and also to presidential candidate Aaron Otto discussing the disgust they are feeling.

As mentioned in the e-mailed letter, the RSO removed as many signs as possible in one hour. Tuesday night they went back out and removed even more signs.

Election Chair Sean Asbury said RSO does not appear to be targeting any specific candidates.

"As far as I know it's been a completely random takedown," Asbury said.

Signs were removed from areas outside the K-State Student Union to those around Denison, Anderson and Seaton halls.

Well-lit areas seemed to be avoided, Otto said.

The RSO is upset with the signs candidates are posting on trees around campus and urges students who feel the same way to let Student Senate know.

The RSO compiled a three-part list of reasons the candidates should not use signs to solicit votes.

They said the signs are an eyesore, and for a campus that prides itself on cleanliness, it is amazing the signs are condoned.

They also determined that candidates who use signs in their campaign are supporting an industry that is cutting down countless numbers of trees.

Money spent on the signs is another aspect of this year's campaigns that the RSO disagrees with.

They said they think the money should be donated to shelters and community groups.

There is no way to figure out who is doing this, Otto said.

"It is sad. We have a very limited amount of money. It gets frustrating when $45 dollars in copies are destroyed," Otto said.

Elections are only a week away and funds are running low, Otto said.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE Adam Balzer, junior in milling science management, and running mate Amy Grieshaber, sophomore in radio and television, believe that parking problems on campus can be resolved with a shuttle service from Bramlage Coliseum parking lot.

Candidates stress parking, student accountability

Adam Balzer and Amy Grieshaber said they are having fun in the Student Governing Association elections, but if elected as president and vice president of the student body, both said they plan to work hard for K-State students.

Balzer, junior in milling science and management, and Grieshaber, sophomore in English, have several ideas in the works for students if they are elected.

First of all, the candidates said they want to address the parking problem on campus. They said they believe the parking lot at Bramlage Coliseum could be used and then students could catch a shuttle to different locations on campus.

"That would solve a lot of the parking problem, and it would be a lot cheaper than building a parking garage," Balzer said.

Grieshaber said they hope to use vehicles that K-State already owns. They also said they would install machines that would scan students' Wildcat card accounts

As he sat poised in a chair at the K-State Student Union, Tim Riemann said what he thought could be done to improve K-State after seeing the problems first hand as a student senator.

Riemann and Jennafer Neufeld are running for student body president and vice president. They have both been involved with the Student Governing Association before and know how it works, Tim Riemann, junior in agricultural economics, pre-law and French, said.

"There are many things we see, that can be done to help students," Riemann said. "We are proposing new things. Vote for us, put us in office and watch us work."

Riemann and his running mate, Jennafer Neufeld, junior in agricultural economics, are familiar with the governing process.

Neufeld is a student senator and is on the Governmental Relations Committee. Riemann has also been a student senator and was vice chair of the Governmental Relations committee at one time.

▶ 24 HOURS IN REVIEW

These briefs encapsulate the news of the past 24 hours, and they are from staff reports, wire reports and other news services.

▶ NATION AND WORLD

• SENATE COMMITTEE HEARS TESTIMONY ON GULF WAR BILL.

TOPEKA — A Senate committee heard testimony on a bill that would require the state to identify Kansas veterans suffering from Gulf War syndrome.

The bill was passed last week by the House on a unanimous vote.

It also would set up a board to advise the Kansas Commission on Veterans Affairs.

The commission would be responsible for surveying veterans for a wide range of physical, mental, employment and other problems and making recommendations for legislation.

• JUDGE ORDERS DEFENDANT TO GIVE HANDWRITING SAMPLES.

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — A federal magistrate today ordered Unabomber defendant Theodore Kaczynski to give handwriting samples so that prosecutors can compare them with evidence seized from his Montana cabin.

U.S. Magistrate Gregory Hollows, responding to a request from prosecutors, ordered Kaczynski, 54, to provide the samples — printed, cursive and numbers — within the next 30 days.

The samples are to be taken at the Sacramento County jail, where Kaczynski is being held in isolation.

The magistrate said he agreed with the prosecutors' contention that extensive samples of Kaczynski's writing were needed.

• 1 KILLED IN STABBING AT NEW JERSEY HIGH SCHOOL.

BAYONNE, N.J. — A teen-ager was stabbed to death Wednesday inside Bayonne High School and another student was critically wounded, authorities said.

Paramedics rushed to the three-story brick school after reports of a stabbing around 8:45 a.m., Mickey McCabe, chief of the Bayonne Emergency Medical Services, said.

Inside, an 18-year-old senior, Aubrey Taylor, was found on the second floor with a stab wound to the heart.

He was rushed to Bayonne Hospital where he died while undergoing surgery.

• GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCES PLAN ON HOSTAGE CRISIS IN PERU.

LIMA, Peru — Peru's president has drafted a plan to end the crisis that has kept 72 hostages in the hands of rebels for 11 weeks, but the guerrillas show no sign that they are ready to go along with it.

They continue to insist on freedom for hundreds of their jailed comrades, and there is no sign that they will settle for the exile or asylum President Alberto Fujimori is suggesting.

Fujimori said his negotiators would present his proposal to the rebels at their ninth round of talks Wednesday afternoon across the street from the Japanese ambassador's house where the hostages have been held since Dec. 17.

• ARAFAT APPEALS FOR SUPPORT AGAINST ISRAELI SETTLEMENT.

UNITED NATIONS — Yasser Arafat said Wednesday that Israel's decision to build a Jewish housing project in east Jerusalem brought the peace process to a critical phase — and U.N. diplomats are obligated to help save it.

Arafat also met with Jewish leaders, then left New York to deliver similar messages to two former U.S. presidents: Jimmy Carter in Georgia and George Bush in Texas.

The U.N. Security Council was to debate on Wednesday afternoon the Israeli decision to build the 6,500-unit Har Homa housing development in east Jerusalem.

European representatives circulated a draft resolution calling on Israel to avoid moves that threaten final talks on the status of the Holy City, part of which the Palestinians want as a future capital.

Israel's acting ambassador, David Peleg, said council action would do nothing to advance peace.

U.S. diplomats also said Washington opposed any binding resolution.

CUSTOMERS ENJOY the first full day of business at the Eclipse Coffee Brewhouse on the corner of 12th and Moro streets in Aggieville. The new coffee shop opened Monday at 8:30 p.m.

after removing dirt and scraping glue, Aggieville's newest coffee shop opens its doors, offering 110 different drinks to choose from

Eclipse Coffee BREWHOUSE

With the grand opening of the Eclipse Coffee Brewhouse Monday evening, Aggieville now has three coffee shops.

Java Espresso & Bakery, Espresso Royale Caffe and the Brewhouse will all compete in the quest to quench the caffeinated thirst of area clientele.

But is there enough business in Manhattan to support three coffee shops?

"I get asked that obviously a lot. The fact is the awareness for coffee has grown tenfold even in the last two years," Kent Dean, owner of the Brewhouse, said.

While renovating the Brewhouse from its former condition as Lair Gauche, the basement floor was jack-hammered, 14-cubic yards of dirt were removed by hand and an electric system was installed. A sprinkler system and restrooms were also installed.

Brewhouse also hired artists to paint murals and scrape glue from the original bank floor.

When they were finished gutting the structure, only one door was left standing from the previous floor design.

As of Monday, the employees, managers and owners of the Brewhouse could step back, take a deep breath, wipe their hands free of the dirt and begin brewing coffee.

"I'm really, really glad to see it open. It was so much work," Jennifer Franklin, Brewhouse manager, said.

The Brewhouse's grand opening Monday evening was a quiet affair. They opened their doors to the public without any prior announcement to the local media.

The Brewhouse brings many choices to the coffee industry. They offer customers 110 different drinks.

The names are as specialized as the Brewhouse itself. If customers are feeling a little northerly in their drink selection, they can sample the Moose Drool, which is a flavored latte.

Customers feeling poetic might order a Jack Kerouac. Beatles fans can sip on the Day Tripper, a smart juice that contains caffeine.

One of the goals of the Brewhouse was to try and create the Baskin-Robbins of coffee, Dean said.

The Brewhouse will offer a smoking area in the basement. The basement has been dubbed the vault, because the vault from the old College State Bank is still intact. The vault will also offer two computers with Internet access and murals done by local artists.

The opening of the Brewhouse has not caused much worry among employees at Java and Espresso.

"I think initially it will probably take about one-third of our business away just out of curiosity," Chris Wicks, Java employee, said.

"After that, I think it will die down, and it will be evenly spread out. The lunch business will stay," Wicks said.

The Brewhouse does not plan to serve soups or sandwiches. Instead they plan to make bagels and hearth breads their specialty, Dean said.

Having almost a decade of existence makes Espresso the oldest coffee shop. The decade-long stay has given Espresso a regular base of customers.

"They know everybody who works here pretty much. We know them. When they walk in here, we know what drinks they're getting," Dave Denning, Espresso employee, said.

Telefund sets new records, raises money for colleges

TRISHA LANGFORD
staff writer

Telefund, the 80-hour fundraising marathon, finished its 20-day run with totals of 23,000 pledges worth $890,324 from alumni and friends in all 50 states, Canada and Puerto Rico.

Additionally, family members contributed about $14,000 to the Parents Telefund Scholarship program and businesses provided more than $20,000 in prizes for volunteer callers.

"We think this is excellent. It was encouraging to see the amount of donor and business support we had," Debbie Hollis, public relations writer at the Foundation, said.

Eight of K-State's nine academic colleges received pledge totals higher than those from 1996, including several that set all-time pledge records.

The largest of the colleges, Arts and Sciences, received the highest amount of pledges with $216,093. The College of Engineering finished with $153,409 an the College of Agriculture with $124,500.

Telefund, completing its 17th year, is a student-driven, alumni-supported telephone campaign. Gifts provide scholarships and other educational benefits in the colleges.

More than 1,300 student and faculty callers raised the money. The callers volunteered four hours, one evening throughout the month.

Michael Kucenic, K-State graduate and currently a University of Kansas medical student, made the trip from Kansas City, Kan., to participate in his fourth year of Telefund calling.

"Many alumni I spoke with were recent graduates and could not afford to donate," Kucenic said. "Why not come down and help make them more money than I could give."

Telefund depends upon a dedicated student body, according to Hollis. The average caller raised more than $700, giving this year's numbers a 7.6 percent increase from last year's total of $827,170.

This year's callers were encouraged to try to get pledges from alumni who had not given in the past.

A caller who succeeded in getting one of these pledges received a G.A.S., Guts and Stamina, award and received two gallons of gas at the Short Stop/Phillips 66 service station in Manhattan.

Other prizes ranged from candy bars to the grand prize of a mountain bike.

Brenda Meadows, senior in engineering, was notified Friday morning that she had won the mountain bike.

Meadows, a fourth-year Telefund participant, was a caller for the College of Engineering and participated on the final night.

"I was awarded the bike during the men's basketball game. Pathfinder picked it out, but I more than approve of it," Meadows said.

Larry Flynt to speak on DB92

CORY MORGAN
staff reporter

Larry Flynt, who publishes magazines such as Hustler, will speak on KSDB-FM 91.9's "A Purple Affair" at 5 p.m. Friday.

Flynt will be live on the air via telephone from Los Angeles. He will speak about the recent movie based on his life, "The People vs. Larry Flynt," and other issues that are incorporated with it.

The public has a right to know about certain issues that have been dealt with in the past and media rights is a big issue, Jason Dechant, co-host of "A Purple Affair," said.

Dechant and the other co-host, Aaron Decker, will interview Flynt on the air and said they are excited about it.

"I look forward to interviewing a man who played such a prominent role in social and legal issues in the past 30 years," Dechant said.

Dechant said he thought Flynt's comments and views would be of interest to students.

The movie "The People vs. Larry Flynt" raised questions about the First Amendment and media rights. A specific case that the movie dealt with was Flynt v. Jerry Falwell, a TV evangelist. Hustler publicized an advertisement that said Falwell had sex with his mother. The Supreme Court finally ruled that the statement was so far fetched that libel was not an issue.

DB92 has publicized Flynt's interview by spreading the word around campus, and it expects a lot of callers, Kelly Flynn, producer of "A Purple Affair," said. "A Purple Affair" is a daily radio show on DB92 that talks about current affairs with a variety of guests.

"We thought that Larry Flynt would be a good person to interview for the show because of the controversy with the media over the recent movie and his involvement with the First Amendment," Flynn said.

Flynt agreed to do the interview to publicize his publications and for the opportunity to be on a Kansas radio show, Dechant said.

DB92 to offer K-State chance to ask Flynt about controversial life

K-State is no stranger to controversy.

But Friday, K-State students will be able to speak to one of the most controversial figures in the freedom-of-speech debate. Publisher Larry Flynt will be featured on a radio call-in program on KSDB-FM 91.9's "A Purple Affair."

In the early 1970s, Flynt began publishing the magazine Hustler and subsequently became a notorious supporter of the First Amendment after being charged numerous times with violating pornography laws. He was also sued by evangelist Jerry Falwell for, among other things, defamation of character.

Now, riding the wave of attention from the recent film, "The People vs. Larry Flynt," Flynt is making himself available to the public to tell his story.

K-State students and faculty should take advantage of this fantastic opportunity to speak to Flynt and decide for themselves if he is the patron saint of freedom of the press or nothing more than a smut peddler.

"A Purple Affair" should also be commended for using its air time for the examination of such a topical person instead of its usual broadcast fare.

Editor's note — Although the Collegian editorial board announced candidate endorsements would be published today, it was decided to wait until Monday after the Collegian's series of candidate profiles has run in its entirety.

• FEE COMMITTEE CHAIR CLARIFIES UNION FEE SITUATION.

Editor,

I just wanted to clarify some issues that were brought up in the Collegian's editorial board column on Tuesday. The K-State Student Union came to the Privilege Fee Committee again on Sunday night to discuss the proposed increase in the K-State Student Union Budget.

The proposed increase is from the present $947,464 to the proposed $1,123,964. This is an increase of $176,500. Students who take 12 hours pay about $2.36 per credit hour to support the operation of the Union. The proposed increase will increase this to about $2.77 per credit hour.

The editorial board, the Student Senate and the Privilege Fee Committee have all raised the question "what is the fee increase going to be used for?"

At Sunday's meeting, Union Director Bernard Pitts used the following analogy to answer that question. If he asked you to dump out all the money in your pocket on the table, it would be challenging for you to identify the source of each item in your pocket. Did the money come from student aid? Parents' contribution? Jobs? It would be impossible to tell.

The same is true with the Union. It is impossible to tell how each dollar will be spent. Pitts said that the increase will simply be used to fund a multi-faceted budget for the Union.

The simple fact is that it costs more now to operate the Union. If the proposed increase, or something similar is not passed, then the Union will be forced to make some tough decisions to save money. These decisions could deal with reduced hours, increased pricing, reduced services—all things that affect us, the students.

One of our vice presidential candidates was quoted in Tuesday's Collegian as saying the University should spend the most money on services that benefit the greatest portion of the student body. Well, this is it. The Union does affect all of us in one way or another.

If you have any questions about the Union budget, or the proposed increase then please stop by the Union director's office and visit with Pitts. You can also e-mail me at (jakeb@ksu.edu) or call me at home, 537-9372. I would be happy to answer your questions and listen to your concerns.

• PARTICIPATION IN ELECTIONS PREFERABLE TO VANDALISM.

Editor,

We have reached that point in the school year when the student body gets the privilege of voting on the student leaders of K-State. As you all have noticed, the signs are hung, the banners are flying and the Collegian has begun its pre-election hype.

All of these things are done for a reason. These elections are important and serious, and should be taken exactly that way.

Over the course of the past few days, several students have damaged the efforts of fellow students in their attempt to seek election.

A number of signs and banners have been torn down and chalking has been altered. This is an immature act of vandalism that has no place in our elections, much less at K-State.

I would encourage those people responsible for these acts to vent your frustrations in other ways. Instead of manipulating other hard-working students' efforts, run for office yourself. If you have issues with banners being hung on trees, get involved and try to change the process. If you do not care for the amount of your student fees, get involved and lower them. This is your right, so use it to your advantage.

The Elections Committee has worked year round in an effort to provide this campus with the most fair and equitable elections possible. With the help and approval of Student Senate, the committee revised and passed regulations that help ensure that every student has a fair chance of being elected.

Please support these regulations and let the candidates campaign the way they see fit. It is your choice to vote for the one that best represents you, so instead of hurting them — get to know them and the issues. This will only make you more informed, and the student government a better group.

Concealed-weapon bill opens up world of possibilities

MATT HAWKINS/Collegian

VIEWPOINT
VALERI CRENSHAW

VALERI CRENSHAW is a graduate student in print journalism. You can e-mail your comments to Valeri at (vrc4359@ksu.edu)

Hip, hip, hooray. Let's hear it for our state lawmakers. Those guys and gals have done it again. It's amazing what those legislators can do when they put their heads together.

They have absolutely outdone themselves with that concealed-weapons bill. I feel as if they have read my mind. I have been waiting for something like this for a long time.

Bill 2159, which is still being considered by the Kansas Legislature, would enable all Kansans 21 and over who are of sound mind and clean criminal record to carry a concealed weapon.

By arming citizens of Kansas with concealed weapons, we will be able to solve all of our problems without worrying about the police or laws.

I think that this bill will really clean things up around K-State. We can start carrying guns and take care of the little things that just get under your skin and eat away at you.

I realize that technically the bill prohibits concealed weapons on campus, but who's really going to be that nitpicky? What are they going to do, search each of us as we drive on campus? Talk about a good excuse for being late to class. "Sorry, Dr. So and So, I was late for class because of my routine search and seizure." Besides, if we are packing heat, we will want to be protected when we leave campus, so we will at least want our guns in our cars. Duh.

I think this bill will be most useful to solve that nasty little parking problem we routinely squabble over here at ol' K-State. If there is any question who gets the next available parking spot, we could just have a duel. You know, students could pace off and see who is really deserving of this scarce resource. I think that is only fair.

Concealed weapons would also be so handy during enrollment and fee payment. The next time you get bumped from that desperately needed class, flash your shiny little handgun. With that kind of backup, you have room to get a little pushy. "I want that 9:30 English class, NOW!" The only problem is if the nice little lady running the computer is also sporting her own concealed weapon — look out.

Think how handy concealed weapons would be at sporting events. Technically, those little revolvers are to stay at home when you attend a sporting event, but who's going to be that technical?

Tailgating would be so much more enjoyable if we could arrive equipped with a little pistol. I remember last year when this obnoxious little Nebraska fan was running through a K-State area in his red polyester pants waving an NU flag.

A few people threw beer cans at him. Boring. To really have some fun, we should have had guns. I am not advocating killing the idiot, maybe just graze him. You know, to show him who's boss.

To really take advantage of our lawmakers' generosity, we should provide Bill Snyder and Tom Asbury with a nice little pistol to keep in their sports coats. It could be purple with a little Powercat on it. They could use the little gem to keep the refs in line. If there was a bad call, Snyder could make the zebra dance a little. You know, put the fear of God in him.

Personally, I would tote my little bullet spewing friend to Lawrence for the next Sunflower Showdown. It would give a whole new meaning to "No one's got a gun to your head," and it would be open season on Jayhawks.

The sad thing is that Kansas lawmakers won't allow those residents under 21 to pack heat. But I figure, hey, people under 21 aren't supposed to drink, and anyone under 16 isn't supposed to drive ... like that ever happens. There will just be a new market for fake concealed weapons licenses.

The introduction of this law could also benefit us in the form of a curriculum change. We could add the weapons safety and training course required by the state as a new class. Maybe it would fall under the heading of civics.

This new bill could also alter fashion as we know it. Think about the market for a K-State sweatshirt with a built-in holster.

Powercat keychains that could hold extra bullets. Signs for our vehicles that say, "Concealed weapon on board." I am envisioning a store in Aggieville called Guns 'R' Us.

I know that many of you are mad that we could not legally carry concealed weapons on campus or in our favorite bars, but we will get around that. We always do.

But I don't want you to be angry at the legislators for prohibiting concealed weapons in the Capital building. That is only natural.

This is such a great bill that the lawmakers don't want to take advantage of it. You can surely understand that, can't you?

Lawmakers — go for it. The possibilities are endless. This is gold, baby. Gold.

Flannel, Doc Martens do not make a rebel

VIEWPOINT
JUSTIN WILD

JUSTIN WILD is a senior in English and education. You can your e-mail comments to Justin at (justone@ksu.edu).

America loves her rebels. Part of America was founded by Puritans, cast out of Europe for standing against the common faiths of the time. Almost a hundred years later, a confederacy of states rebelled, and the result of their actions still symbolizes something to most Americans, be it positive or negative.

Our true rebels, the ones people strive to emulate, come from popular figures and the artistic endeavors of various Americans. The gunslingers of the Old West have become mythic, as have popular cult figures such as Jack Kerouac and James Dean. These figures wander our unconscious desert of cacti, neon and drugs.

It is within this realm which our culture revolves, separating people into two different areas. Is one hip? How alternative can a person be? And, just what is alternative?

This first came to our own generation's mass conscious when grunge exploded into popular culture in the early 1990s. Some critics have said that grunge died the minute clothing stores mass-marketed designer flannels and Doc Martens, sending the faithful scuttling like hermit crabs to find new symbols of rebellion.

Other critics speak of the tragedy regarding bands that followed the movement, acting as a metaphorical sieve, sifting away legitimacy until nothing was left but our present state of music today, claimed by some to be a wasteland.

What I find wrong with both of these arguments is the fact that they base the status of being alternative, or different, based on physical or artistic objects. Flannel shirts and Doc Marten boots never made anything or anyone alternative. A person's compact disc collection doesn't make someone alternative.

What makes someone alternative, or a rebel, if you will, is the way they think.

Everything we've classified ourselves by, whether that label be something as concrete as Generation X (which, by the way, I hate), to something as abstract as simply alternative, is a myth. What makes a person a rebel, standing out from the crowd, is intellect.

When an individual professes their tastes, and then stands by that choice, then they are truly a part of an alternative group in this country.

Just as one might be alternative by piercing their lip or eyebrow, so might one buy a designer shirt, so long as they are comfortable with who and what they are, as well as what they stand for.

I can understand bitterness and the resignation against someone who appears false to a movement they claim to adhere to.

What I don't understand is our capacity to so vehemently judge someone as to give them a label. This is ironic to me, because I believe that although none of us want a label slapped on our foreheads, we are more than ready to classify someone else at a glance.

> "Flannel shirts and Doc Marten boots never made anything or anyone alternative. A person's compact disc collection doesn't make someone alternative."

The level of unacceptedness that some subcultures maintain towards other people bothers me. Is there some mythical proving ground a person must pass through before being different or alternative? If that place does exist, I challenge that one does not get through on their intellect, but on how they dress and behave.

One person's cultural field is another's wasteland. I have yet to meet someone my age who has decided exactly who they are and what they will be. The point of humanity is to evolve, and that is a painful process in which we try on many lives before finding one which suits us.

We are all walking in the dark, holding hands, trying to find one another.

Candidates promise to close open purse of SGA, battle for issues of average student

Star Wars — perhaps the most perfect movie ever made.

The story, drawn from elements of mythology as old as humankind itself, resonates today with a freshness and vitality that remains unmatched.

This has nothing to do with our campaign, but we just saw the new version of Empire Strikes Back and it was boss.

This year, students at K-State find themselves faced with a decision that will affect them for years. That question is: Do I watch Cosby on CBS or The Jeff Foxworthy Show on NBC? We cannot help you with that — it is a choice that you must make on your own.

But, Rafferty and Hock can help you make another decision. Let us put it simply: We want to be your student body president and vice president. Sure, we laugh, and joke, but we have come up with good ideas, and we have an honest desire to keep students more in touch with Student Governing Association.

This year, you will make the choice: do you want another year of the same SGA, spending with little regard and little result, or do you want a president willing to fight for student needs and a vice president willing to be the bridge between students and the administration? Rafferty and Hock are those candidates.

SGA has become an island, far away from any regular student who happens to pass by it in the K-State Student Union. It is remote, cold; like the ice planet Hoth in Empire (sorry, but the movie was so cool, especially in a theater with THX sound).

SGA is closed to the average student. How often do you talk to your senators? How often do you feel that you are being represented and that your opinion matters? How many times have you been asked what you want your money spent on? Under the current regime, SGA is little better than a high-school clique — a clique spending your money.

It is time for this clique of student career politicians to be broken up. It is time for some newcomers to run SGA for the students and not their résumés.

What we need are two regular students — the kind of people who eat Ramen noodles; the kind of people who schedule their classes around the Cartoon Network; the kind of people who turn socks inside out to get another day out of them. In short, the kind of people that Rafferty and Hock are.

When we are elected, we promise not only to keep the doors to SGA open — anyone can do that — but also to come out and talk to you and find out what matters in your world — the K-State world. We will fight for lower fees.

We will shut the purse that has been held open for too long. Rafferty and Hock will find out how real students feel about real issues, not how career politicians feel.

Look at it this way: We are English majors. Given the current job market, do you think we are doing this for our résumés?

English symposium to address gender relations, cultural issues

CLAUDETTE RILEY
news editor

Approaching the millennium, academics from a range of universities will present papers on property, commodity and culture in the 6th Annual Cultural Studies Symposium.

An international scope of scholars will present more than 75 papers during the 25 sessions when the symposium begins at 10:45 a.m. today.

Timothy Dayton, assistant professor of English and director of the cultural studies graduate track, said the initial symposium primarily provided K-State faculty an opportunity to present their work.

Dayton said the concept of the symposium originated while working with other professors in the English department.

"We're in the middle of Kansas and instead of going somewhere else, we thought we would bring people here," Dayton said. "We've seen the literature and cultural studies become quite dynamic as a result."

Topics during the symposium will include property rights, gender relations, racial identity and cultural issues.

"This is an interdisciplinary conference, and there's research on 19th century novels and labor relations. That's the feel of the day," Dayton said. "Anybody who is going into graduate school or even a journalist who deals with cultural issues, would benefit from these panel discussions."

A request for papers with two dozen topic suggestions was sent last year and a number of K-State faculty and graduate students responded.

"The presenters are from K-State and different universities," Dayton said. "Teaching is one thing but the gloves sort of come off when they are presenting research."

Donald Hedrick, professor of English, will present his paper "Universal Prostitution and Early Modern Self-Commodification in Shakespeare" in a Friday morning session.

As past director of the symposium and a member of the committee, Hedrick said he has seen the presenter list grow larger and more prestigious. The list includes faculty from China, Canada and several European countries.

"This has attracted interest although it's a smaller conference and an out of the way conference, which makes it more impressive that they want to come," Hedrick said. "We have to draw people in with intellectual excitement."

Admission to any session is free for undergraduates. Non-undergraduates affiliated with the University can register in the English department office. The registration fee increases from $10 to $20 for graduate students or faculty once the conference begins.

Hedrick said students interested in advanced levels of academics, discussing intellectual issues or considering graduate studies should take advantage of papers at this national conference.

"I would encourage students who are interested in scholarly activities in the University to drop in, and they should feel free to check out the programs," Hedrick said.

Photographer documents abuse, drug addiction in couple's home

DANEDRI THOMPSON
staff reporter

The lights went out and music filled Union Forum Hall Wednesday night as Donna Ferrato, award-winning photojournalist, began her lecture on domestic violence with a slide show.

"I didn't start out with an agenda when I first photographed a man beating his wife," Ferrato said.

Ferrato's first photographs of domestic violence started out as a pictorial celebration of love.

Moving in with a family living the American dream, she said she hoped to photograph the couples' love for one another.

She left their home with pictures of the husband beating his wife.

"Lisa, (the wife) had a terrific life," Ferrato said. "She had her freedoms. She could do anything. They had matching his-and-her Ferraris.

"This couple was into swinging and cocaine, but I wasn't there to judge their lifestyle. I didn't like the drugs, but I thought they could handle it, and they were happy."

Garth, the husband, was a self-made millionaire. He designed computer programs for a company.

At first, Ferrato was unnerved by surveillance cameras, installed by Garth, that filmed every part of the house. The control cameras were in his office.

"I didn't like the idea of being spied on the whole time, but he told me he could keep his family safer with the cameras," Ferrato said.

Then Ferrato realized the things Garth was doing.

"He told his wife how to dress, how to walk. After she had babies, he wrapped her in bandages so she'd get back her girlish figure. I didn't understand what either of them were about," Ferrato said.

After the mafia visited the couples' home selling drugs, Ferrato left the house only to return when Lisa asked her to because Garth was acting erratic.

"I told Lisa that she needed to stop using drugs," Ferrato said.

Lisa hid the drugs from Garth that night.

"I could hear Lisa screaming. I found Garth attacking her. He continued to bully her until he started to hit her," Ferrato said.

Ferrato backed her story of Lisa and Garth with a series of pictures.

The first pictures showed Lisa playing with one of her children on a playground. Later pictures showed Garth with his fist back preparing to hit his wife.

"He didn't care that I was there," Ferrato said.

"It didn't matter to him because he thought it was OK."

After witnessing the attack, Ferrato lived in shelters, rode with police, went into the courtrooms and lived with women who have killed in self defense to learn more about domestic violence.

One photo of a woman lying in a hospital bed with tire marks across her chest really angered Cristal Folsom, freshman in pre-law.

"To think that anyone has the gall to run over a women ... with a car needs help," Folsom said.

"The way I work," Ferrato said, "is by getting into people's lives."

Ferrato also talked with the audience about shelters and the justice system.

"Why do we tell women to go to a shelter?" she said.

"It makes more sense to remove the one who is perpetrating the violence from the house.

"We need to turn these shelters into detention centers for men who are beating their wives."

Ferrato said she believes men aren't the only abusive ones.

"This is not a gender thing. It is much more about power and control," she said.

"I really believe we have to look at this as a human rights issue."

Steve Stewman, sophomore in kinesiology, said he was glad Ferrato made the men in the audience feel comfortable.

"I like the fact that she didn't just blame men," Stewman said.

The system and the attitudes that men and women have about relationships are the biggest problems, Ferrato said.

She said she believes woman are able to get some of the help they need from shelters, but there needs to be help for abusers as well.

"We don't have really good long-term help for batterers," Ferrato said. "We just send them to jail."

She said that important changes are bettering the system, though.

Police aren't just telling the batterer to take a walk around the block.

Many states now have mandatory arrest policies and in Kansas, the courts don't wait for the victim to press charges. The county presses charges instead.

The abuse Ferrato photographed led her to start a non-profit organization.

The Domestic Abuse Awareness Project, founded in 1991, hopes to expose and eradicate violence in the home.

Ferrato's lecture was sponsored by Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee and the Women's Center. Her book of photography, "Living with the Enemy," can be purchased in the K-State Union Bookstore.

Weekend tourney offers ingredients to cook up March Madness

With Kemper Arena polished and decked out in a hardwood floor, the inaugural Big 12 Conference Tournament is set to begin today in Kansas City, Mo.

While this stands as only an appetizer to the upcoming Big Dance entree, our own four-day Midwestern Madness offers many teams the chance to stake their claim to an NCAA bid or say a last goodbye and return home empty handed.

Needless to say, there is much to be discovered within the weekend Kemper clash.

First and foremost, don't expect KU to hoist the conference championship trophy. Although every area sports writer has been busy trying to secure a first-class seat on the Jayhawk bandwagon, don't believe the hype.

The Hawks, while dominant in the Big 8 Conference regular seasons, only won the tourney once (1992). After that victory, KU proceeded to chalk up a No. 1 seed in the Big Dance and used it to bow down second round to the mighty Miners of Texas-El Paso.

VIEWPOINT

JON BALMER

JON BALMER is a freshman in pre-journalism and mass communications. You can e-mail your comments to Jon at (jkb2004@ksu.edu).

This season, KU has a No. 1 seed already locked up, eliminating any benefits a Big 12 tourney crown might have added to the Jayhawk's résumé. Although Coach Roy Williams will feed the press endless ramblings about the significance of the tournament, he's already getting his troops strapped up for the rigors of the NCAA Tournament. Expect a cameo and nothing more from the imaginary birds of Lawrence.

The team that's most likely to be dubbed Hawk Slayer is Baylor. The Bears have been two-faced all season long, alternating from assassins (11 three-pointers drained when they visited Bramlage Coliseum) to laugh-ins (losing to lowly Texas A&M AND being out-rebounded by the smaller Aggies), so you never know which Waco squad is gonna show.

But when properly motivated, Baylor can compete with any Big 12 Conference comrade. Needing some serious tournament results to snag a bid to the Big Dance, the Bears should come to play.

If the big Bears can hold their own inside, and the three-point target is on, look for Baylor to slap KU in the second round of conference play.

While beating Kansas would stand as a significant accomplishment, don't expect Baylor to win the tourney title.

The Conference crown should be placed firmly on the noggin of Herbie and his Husker crew. Why, might you ask, will a 16-13 squad come out of the rough and rambunctious Big 12 on top?

Three simple reasons, Cat kids. Leading off, Big Red leader Danny Nee is sitting on the coaches' griddle again, and a Kemper conquest would hold off the Husker hounds one more year.

Secondly, an inside-outside beat down has finally jelled for the Red Army, due to the collaboration of Tyronn Lue and Mikki Moore. Moore, a senior center, has finally lived up to his early expectations and become an inside force in Lincoln.

On the flip side, Lue has come up big leading the Huskers this season, and he's only a sophomore. The kid is most definitely big time, as evidenced by his turnouts on the road against Iowa State (30 points) and Kansas (27). Where there's a conference pressure cooker, Lue has been cooler than a Slurpee.

The last and most important side note that points to Husker happiness is the tournament bracket. By the grace of pairings, Nebraska has been placed on the easier side of the field. Opening against a non-existent Missouri squad, the Huskers should roll right over Stormin' Norman and into a showdown with third-seeded Texas.

The Longhorns play in the ex-Southwest Conference tournament was not memorable, so look for more of the same. This will probably lead to a third-round match-up with Colorado, a team not used to receiving an at-large bid to the Big Dance.

This newly found feeling will numb the pain after the Buffs' fall to the focused Huskers. With this three-game momentum swing, the Big Red surge will bag up the crown and etch itself into Big 12 Tournament history.

With the orgy of basketball and barbecue happenin' in KC this weekend, festivities for March Madness have begun. But before you get lost in the tangled web of round ball, keep all eyes focused on the Big 12 tourney for previews of things to come.

THE WILDCATS CELEBRATE as a team after downing Texas Tech 76-68 in the second round of the Big 12 Tournament.

Cats claw No. 15 Texas Tech

SUN DEE MILLS
sports writer

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Knocking off nationally ranked teams at home was something the Wildcats' women's basketball team had done with wins over Texas and Nebraska. Doing it on the road hadn't happened until the second-round game of the Big 12 Tournament, when the Cats beat the No. 15 Texas Tech Red Raiders 76-68.

"We knew Texas Tech was potent because of their ability to get hot from the perimeter and knock down threes and because of Alicia Thompson," Coach Deb Patterson said. "But I never thought we lost control of the game."

Red Raider forward Rene Hanebutt knocked down six of 12 treys, tying her career record and contributed 20 points to the game. All-America candidate Thompson was 13 for 22 from the field, with 26 total points.

Thompson had the first score of the game and the only lead for Tech. Senior point guard Missy Decker hit the first of four three-pointers a minute and a half into the game to take the lead. The Cats never looked back.

"We were in such a good rhythm," senior center Kayla Hester said. "I felt we had the momentum to hold them. I never thought they'd creep up on us."

Hester shook off her recent shooting slump with three treys and 11 total points. Hester also pulled down a game-high nine boards in her first 40-minute game.

"The only surprise from Kayla was her ability to play 40 minutes," Patterson said. "Unlike Missy and Andria (Jones), both of whom we play that much, Kayla played 15 more minutes than she's had to in the past."

Decker and junior guard Brit Jacobson played 40 minutes as well. Senior forward Jones would have, too, Patterson said, but she chalked up her fourth foul at the 7:48 mark of the second half and returned to the bench.

Freshman forward Nicky Ramage started the game, and the only sub off the bench was freshman center Angie Finkes. Finkes and Ramage were the only two players of the six that played not to score in double-digits. Patterson said the freshmen have improved tremendously in the course of the season.

"This game was just a testament of how hard they have worked all season," Patterson said. "Today they had the opportunity, or the challenge, of playing together. They stepped up. Certainly, they can play better, but I was really proud of how they stepped up."

Thompson's first basket was her only one for 12 minutes. Jones was primarily responsible for guarding her, but she said help was required.

"She's so quick and such a great leaper," Jones said. "Most of the game I remember looking at her feet. It took a lot of double-teaming her, because you can't do it by yourself."

An injury to Tech guard Crystal Boles early in the game hurt the Red Raiders defensively on the inside, Coach Marsha Sharp said.

"Crystal has held down the middle of our zone throughout this season," Sharp said. "Having her out hurt us a lot."

Jacobson's 18 points, eight rebounds and 10 assists were two boards shy of a triple-double, but the assists were an individual season-high record for the Cats.

Jones was the high scorer for the Cats with 20 points, but with three of her other teammates in double-digits, she said the win was one every player contributed to.

"It was a total team effort," Jones said. "That's why we were so successful early.

K-STATE'S NICKY RAMAGE pulls down a rebound over Texas Tech's Rene Hanebutt late in the game Wednesday during the second round of the Big 12 Tournament in Kansas City, Mo.

Wildcats defeat ranked team, take step toward NCAA tournament berth

SHANE McCORMICK
sports writer

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Just like the Energizer bunny, the K-State women's basketball team keeps going and going.

With a 76-68 second-round win over Texas Tech, the Cats are standing on firmer ground for an NCAA Tournament berth.

The Cats damaged their NCAA chances with a season finale loss at Baylor. Coming into the Big 12 Tournament, it was thought the Cats would need at least two wins to get into the NCAAs.

The Cats took care of things in the first round with a convincing 81-56 win over Oklahoma. They sealed the second part of the deal with a solid win over the 15th-ranked Red Raiders.

It was the first time the Cats had advanced to the third round since 1990.

So did another win against a quality opponent get the Cats an invitation to the Big Dance?

"Well, we'll just have to wait and see," Coach Deb Patterson said. "I think it definitely enhances our standings at this point and time."

"Anytime you get a win against a quality opponent like Texas Tech at this time of the year, it helps you out," she said. "It will be a culmination of things. We will just have to see how everything pans out. We still have an opportunity to play tomorrow."

If the Cats did do enough for an invitation, it will be their first appearance since 1987. The Cats have made just seven appearances in the NCAA Tournament.

Another factor on the Cats' side is the level of competition they have faced this season. The Cats' schedule includes 10 teams that have participated in the 1996 NCAA Tournament. Eight opponents have been either ranked or are receiving votes in the Feb. 24 Associated Press Poll. The Cats have beaten six of those teams.

While Patterson might be uncertain about the Cats' tournament chances, Red Raider coach Marsha Sharp has no doubts as to whether the Cats will make the tournament.

"Absolutely, they will make it," she said. "I meant that and knew that before I watched the game. Seeing them play all year long, I knew they were a tournament team."

Sharp said the strength of the conference will help the Cats' chances to make the tournament.

"We've played a lot of teams last year. There are seven teams in the Big 12 that are a lot better than the top three or four teams in other conferences. This is just a terrific conference. It is as good as any in the country," Sharp said.

Coming into the season, few if any expected the Cats to be in position for a NCAA Tournament berth. Patterson said her team has created its own opportunity to do so.

"This is certainly a team that has adjusted to a whole new way of things this season," she said. "This team has really matured and gained confidence as the season has gone along. They have really stepped up and made things happen for themselves."

Cats prepare to play 4 games in 4 days, hope to stand out in inaugural Big 12 tourney

JEREMY KELLEY
sports writer

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The fact is that the Big 12 Tournament isn't set up for sub-par teams to win, but rather constructed so the best team wins in the end.

K-State (10-16, 3-13), which opens its first round of tournament play today against the No. 5 seed Texas Tech (18-8, 10-6).

"We're just going to go out and play hard," Coach Tom Asbury said. "We should be ecstatic to play four games in four days and as you know, anything can happen in tournament time. We don't talk about being the bottom seed, in fact, we didn't mention it all week."

Mentioning it won't change the fact that Asbury is not a huge supporter of the way the tournament bracket is set up. Asbury said there should be an off day in between the third and fourth games of the tournament to cut down on what he dubbed as ugly games.

"That fourth game is just sloppy and even the third game isn't all that pretty," he said. "Teams are too tired because they're not used to playing that many games."

But at least today's 2:20 p.m. tipoff is against a familiar opponent.

In Manhattan on Jan. 18, the Cats dominated the Red Raiders in the first half of the contest exercising a 10-point lead at one instance.

However, K-State fizzled toward the end of the game and couldn't stop the one-two punch of guard Cory Carr and center Tony Battie, who combined for 49 of Tech's 73 points.

Carr now leads the conference in scoring — his total per game averaging 22.8 points — while Battie is chipping in 18.9 per outing.

Stopping Carr and Battie will be the Cats' main assignment.

"I think our last game we played well, but we had a letdown at the end," guard Ayome May said.

"We need to go out and rebound better and defend well and then we can get a win."

No doubt defense will be the key, but K-State will have to assert itself without forward Manny Dies.

Dies pulled a calf muscle in the Cats' game against Missouri last Saturday and did minor workouts in Wednesday's practice at Kemper Arena. Dies is questionable for today's game.

"Injuries are the name of the game. This one came at an inopportune time for our team," Asbury said. "We may go a little smaller and adjust around it like a good team would."

K-State will not only miss Dies' presence on the defensive end, but also on the offensive end. In his five games back after suffering a foot injury, Dies recorded a pair of double-doubles against Colorado and Iowa State and missed a third one by one rebound against Missouri.

"That's unfortunate that he is injured, and that is surely a disappointment to their team," Tech Coach James Dickey said. "But it won't change anything we do or anything we plan to do."

Tech meanwhile remains optimistic about its second meeting with K-State.

"They're a well-coached ball club whose record doesn't reflect their ability," Battie said. "They've had some tough breaks. We need to come out and assert ourselves and be aggressive."

THE PRICE OF EDUCATION AND STUDENT LOANS

It's all a matter of payback

RYAN O'HALLORAN
staff writer

Every five years, Congress is required by law to reauthorize the Higher Education Act of 1965, or, in other words, re-fund the nation's student-aid programs.

In charge of advising Congress on issues pertaining to student aid is the National Student Aid Advisory Committee.

And at a recent hearing of the committee, Larry Moeder, K-State director of student financial assistance, said he heard some interesting news.

"One of the big issues was loans and grants," Moeder said. "The fact that students have to rely so much on loans is concerning the Congressional delegation, and they're looking to put more money in the grant program so students don't owe a tremendous amount of money when they get done with school. That's good."

The news represented a change in stance by Congress.

"Last year, students across the country really played a major role in the change in attitudes of Congress," Moeder said. "They were ready to cut funding for higher education, but they received so much outcry from students and parents that they did a quick reversal."

Moeder said university administrators have been urging Congress to look at this issue for years.

"The financial aid community has been telling them for years that kids are having to borrow too much money," Moeder said. "And finally, they're understanding that."

If Congress does in fact up the ante regarding grants, it will help all students involved at K-State, where 70 percent of the students receive some sort of assistance, and nationwide.

For 14 credit hours, the going rate for an out-of-state student at K-State is $7,903 – and that's without book expenses and housing costs. By comparison, the in-state tuition rate is between $2,000 and $3,000.

In last September's issue of Money magazine, the room and board for a K-State student was $11,139. Other schools, such as Iowa, where 32 percent of its students are out-of-state, was $10,633.

"Compared to other schools in other states, it's actually a bargain," Moeder said. "It's cheaper than in-state tuition at a number of schools on the east coast."

According to a pamphlet published by United Student Aid Funds, the annual number of loans students take is close to 7 million, worth $25 billion.

The average college student leaves school $12,000 in debt, and 70 percent of K-State students currently receive financial assistance.

"That's remained a pretty constant number at K-State," Moeder said.

The role of the financial aid office is to get the student the required money. But once they finish school, the University is finished with them.

"We're out of the collection process," Moeder said.

If a student has a $5,000 Stafford Loan with 5 percent interest, when their studies are completed, the student owes $5,500.

The University sells the loan to a mortgage or loan company for a price at or slightly above $5,000. The University is guaranteed of getting its money.

The student then pays the outside company, who makes money on the loan.

This is a routine process nationwide.

"Nationally, students are borrowing an average of $9 million a day," Moeder said.

The Stafford Loan, most common among K-State's out-of-state students, along with a subsidized loan, are two kinds of loans.

A Stafford is unsubsidized, which means the student pays the base fee along with the interest that has accumulated over the time.

A subsidized loan has its interest paid by the government until the student graduates. This is used with lower-income families.

Most universities require students to attend an exit interview with the financial aid office to lay everything out, so there are no surprises six months later when the payments start coming in.

Moeder said K-State processed $65 million in all of its student aid programs for all K-State students.

"We receive probably a little more in total student-aid dollars than other schools in the state, but that goes according to the financial need of the student, and we have more of those students at K-State," Moeder said.

Pay that loan back without going bankrupt

Types of loans

Stafford loan:
- most common among K-State's out-of-state students
- unsubsidized– the student pays the base fee along with the interest that has accumulated

Subsidized loan:
- interest is paid by the government
- the student is accountable for only the flat loan fee
- used with lower-income families

Payment options

Standard
- criteria: debts under $10,000 or higher amounts with enough earning power to cover the payments
- payment: equal monthly installments over a period that cannot exceed 10 years
- advantage: offers predictable payment schedule and minimizes total interest costs
- most common payment

Graduated
- criteria: debts of at least $10,000 or other obligations
- payment: starts low and increases over time
- advantage: system provides payment relief during the early years of repayment

Income-Sensitive
- criteria: guaranteed eduation loans provided by private lenders
- payment: starts low and increases as income increases
- advantage: extension of payment period
- disadvantage: interest expenses increase significantly

Long-term, equal-installment
- criteria: debts over $10,000
- payment: equal amounts over a period of up to 30 years
- advantage: maximum repayment time is determined by the amount of the loan
- disadvantage: interest expenses increase significantly

DESPERATE TIMES, DESPERATE MEASURES

The New York Times reported in January that the Taliban movement in Afghanistan is presiding over such a bankrupt economy that a viable career field now has men (women are forbidden to work at all) raiding cemeteries of human bones, which are then sold to dealers in Pakistan as animal bones to be fashioned into cooking oil, soap, chicken feed and buttons. Skulls must first be broken up to preserve the ruse that only animal bones are involved.

SINGING FAREWELL

A cast of drunken, rich characters will take over McCain Auditorium at 8 p.m. March 13 when "Die Fledermaus," an opera written by Johann Sebastian Bach, is brought to the stage.

Most operas are performed in French, Italian or Spanish and don't have dialogue.

"Die Fledermaus" is performed in English and has dialogue, Chad Pape, senior in music education, said.

The plot is based on the lives of rich people who have too much money to spend and nothing to do with it.

"The music is a lot of fun. It is the type of music you can leave the theater humming. You can't do that with most operas," Pape said.

The play is produced this year in honor of Jerry Langenkamp, head of vocal music for K-State, who will be retiring after working at K-State for more than 20 years.

"This is his favorite show, and it will be his last," Pape said.

The tone is not as serious as it is in other operas. This opera is a comedy.

"In fact it is the most unoperatic opera I have seen. It is more like a musical," Jerry Huston, stage manager, said. "It's like watching a drunken orgy."

It's more like going to a movie or going to the theater to watch a play, Huston said.

"It's slapstick comedy you sit back and enjoy," Jill Volland, sophomore in musical theater, said. "There is even audience participation."

CHAD PAPE, senior in musical education, and Tim Bonnell, sophomore in vocal performance, perform a scene from Die Fledermaus Wednesday afternoon in the Union Courtyard. "Die Flendermaus" will be performed at 8 p.m. March 13 in McCain Auditorium.

Committee approves measure allowing concealed handguns

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A legislative committee on Wednesday approved a measure that would allow Kansans to carry concealed handguns, setting the stage for a significant debate sometime next week.

"It's a very restrictive bill," said Rep. Gary Hayzlett, R-Lakin, the bill's principal sponsor.

The House Federal and State Affairs Committee endorsed the measure on a voice vote. It now goes to the House. Five of the committee members asked to have their no votes recorded.

Supporters say allowing law-abiding citizens who have undergone training and have a permit to carry a gun will deter crime. Opponents say having more people armed would do nothing for public safety and could result in more accidental shootings.

Another bill allowing people to carry concealed firearms is now before the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee.

Kansas law generally allows individuals to carry concealed weapons only on their own property or at their own businesses. Thirty-one states allow the general public to carry concealed weapons if they meet certain requirements.

A similar bill was passed by the House last year, but failed in the Senate. Supporters say the measure will be passed by the House again, and there is more support in the Senate than last year.

Gov. Bill Graves has repeatedly said he has heard little in the way of support for such a measure among voters.

He has stopped short of saying he would veto it, however.

Hayzlett said, "I guess you would say I'm concerned. I've heard he is not enthusiastic."

The bill requires background checks for people who want permits that are as detailed as those for gubernatorial appointees and KBI special agents.

The bill was amended by the committee to allow businesses to post signs prohibiting people from carrying their guns into the premises, even if they have permits.

However, city and county governments would not be able to pass ordinances outlawing concealed handguns, and all such ordinances on the books now would be wiped out.

As proposed, applicants must:

- Be at least 21 years of age
- Have no felony convictions
- Not be chemically dependent
- Not be under a court order affecting the spousal relationship
- Be a legal resident of Kansas for six months.

The bill also requires applicants to complete a handgun training course.

It would ban concealed weapons in a school, jail, police station, polling place, government meeting and any bar or restaurant that serves alcohol.

It's time for SGA Elections.

BALZER

and charge a small fee.

"We'll try to set the fee so it can pay for itself," Grieshaber said.

Balzer said they could get together with Parking Services and the different departments on campus and probably have the system going by fall '97.

Balzer and Grieshaber said they would also like to work on a shuttle system to give students a safe ride home from the bars in Aggieville.

Grieshaber said this system could also be paid for on a per-use basis with a Wildcat card.

"We wouldn't transport them to Aggieville. We'd just be transporting them from," Balzer said.

He said a designated-driver system is something that needs to happen.

"One way to go about it is to possibly create student jobs by having people who don't drink drive the shuttles during the evenings and nights," Balzer said.

In regard to instructor evaluations, Balzer said he would still like to work for publishing evaluations, but he would like to use a separate form for students who would like their comments published.

"That would help weed out some of the not-so-serious comments," Balzer said.

He said these evaluations could possibly be posted on the Internet or in the library and the K-State Student Union.

They said they would also like to establish a policy that would regulate the behavior of students who are involved in extra-curricular activities such as theater and debate, not just sports. Balzer and Grieshaber said there should be penalties for students who are representatives of K-State and get arrested.

"It should be across the board. If you're going to represent K-State, then you should be a good citizen. And you should be able to be a good citizen because you are proud to represent K-State," Grieshaber said.

She said it seems like only football and basketball players get attention when they get in trouble with the law.

"People in debate can get in trouble just like people in sports. It shouldn't be so one-sided like that," Grieshaber said.

Grieshaber said they have thought about forms to use for this program.

The forms would let participants know that if they are in trouble with the law, they will suffer a consequence such as a suspension from their activity.

"Wholeheartedly, the people, I'm pretty sure, would definitely support something like this just because it'd help them look better as a University, and it wouldn't be hard to come up with that," Balzer said.

Grieshaber said they would still need to work out the details of what offenses would constitute punishment.

"DUIs, domestic violence, criminal damage to property — those are all things where if you are a representative of K-State, does K-State want you to represent it?" Grieshaber said.

Both Balzer and Grieshaber said they feel they would make good leaders for K-State because they are average students.

"It doesn't matter to me so much if I win, but if I win I will serve the student body the best I can," Grieshaber said.

She said she is a regular student, and she is willing to look at both sides of an issue.

"If I don't get elected, I know somebody else will who could do just as good a job as I could. But I'm having fun at K-State, and I feel I can help the students, because I feel like I can relate to the students more than some of the candidates can," Balzer said.

JAIL

visual check on the inmates as often as they should."

The jail uses a camera monitoring system to watch inmate activity, but that too is inadequate, Edvy said.

"We can watch them on the monitors in the booking room, but there's not always someone there and the cameras don't see everything," he said. "We need to have direct supervision, but we don't have the manpower for that."

The jail cells are divided into two cell blocks that allow for the separation of inmates.

"We can put the inmates in the two separate blocks, but that's not enough," Edvy said. "We can't separate everybody — juveniles, felonies from first-offenders, gang members. We can't make those distinctions with this system. It's just the lesser of two evils game."

The jail, built in the 1930s, also has to contend with the upkeep of the aging building.

"We have old plumbing and old electricity here," Edvy said. "It's difficult to repair, and it takes a lot of time. If the toilet in a cell doesn't work, we can't use that cell."

The jail, until recently, still used a coal-burning stove to heat the building's three floors, Edvy said.

"Three years ago we put in the central heat unit," he said. "That room there, that used to be the coal chute," Edvy said. "Now it's the Emergency Operations Center for the county. It's got some of the most state-of-the-art technology you'll see around — in the coal chute."

Riemann and Neufeld have three main ideas that they would like to have implemented if they are elected.

Riemann said their first priority if elected would be to work with the state legislature to establish a state education grant. The main purpose behind this idea would be to help students with the expense of college.

"It would help needy students finance college. It would also help some students go to college that otherwise wouldn't have the opportunity," he said

Secondly, Riemann and Neufeld would like to start a student advisory committee on teaching excellence. Students would complete the teacher evaluations and grade their teachers on certain aspects. The teachers then do an evaluation on the course that they taught. Teachers would also evaluate how they think the course they teach is set up.

A neutral committee would then gather all of the information from both the teachers and students. They would then proceed to summarize the information and publish it in a book. The book is then made available for the students to buy.

"One of the good things about the student advisory committee is that it is already in use at the University of Chicago," Neufeld said. "That really helps us in trying to convince people about its use."

The final idea that Riemann and Neufeld would to bring to K-State is the plus system. The plus system is adding a plus to grades in the B, C and D grade levels. There would be no minus and it would still be based on the 4.0 scale.

Riemann and Neufeld said they believe a plus system would benefit students on a three-fold range.

It would reward student for excellence in grade levels and make a K-State graduate just as competitive as students from other schools who already have the system in place, Riemann said. It would also give a K-State graduate an advantage over a student from a school that does not have the system, he said.

For example, a student who receives an 89 percent in a class would have the opportunity to be rewarded for extra efforts.

A student with an 81 percent would still receive a B. Riemann and Neufeld said the system would not require instructors to implement the plus system. They said it would just give instructors another resource to reward extra effort.

"It also gives teachers greater flexibility in grading," Riemann said.

Neufeld said the plus system is already in place at University of Nebraska, along with 6 percent of colleges in the nation.

Riemann and Neufeld said they do not want to fall into the trap of previous student body presidents.

"In the past, many student body presidents have worked very hard in an attempt to keep tuition from increasing," Riemann said. "Jennafer and I have learned by observing these individuals that no matter how hard you work it is very hard to keep tuition from increasing. That doesn't mean that I think it should be raised."

"We are taking a pro-active approach. Let's try not to go against the grain, let's help the students who really need it," Neufeld said. "Tim and I believe that there are positive changes that can happen from day to day. We have the background and the experience to make things happen."

WIN

People were knocking down threes and playing good defense."

The closest the Red Raiders ever came to the Cats was at the beginning of the second half, by narrowing the lead to five points.

Tough Cat defense and the desire to win gave the Cats the game, Sharp said.

"The most important thing I can say is that K-State deserved to win," Sharp said. "They played with great heart and great intensity. We allowed them to spread us out and didn't go get the shooters we needed to."

What's next? A trip to the third round against the team that delivered the Cats their toughest losses of the season — Kansas.

"It's an opportunity to line up and compete against one of the best teams in the country, Patterson said. "Certainly we won't take that lightly."

To win, Patterson said it would be essential to contain all-America candidate and first-team all-Big 12 member Tamecka Dixon, something Baylor did not do in their second-round 66-54 loss to the Jayhawks.

"I think we have to be preoccupied with trying to keep Tamecka in control," Patterson said. "That's certainly easier said than done. If you've seen her play, you know she has the ability to single-handedly take over the game."

Although the Cats might have entered the NCAA Tournament with the win over Tech, Patterson said she is happy to still be in the Big 12 Tournament.

"We're just thrilled to have the opportunity to play tomorrow," Patterson said.

UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.

Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.

Fortunately, that's a mistake you can avoid with SRAs—tax-deferred annuities from TIAA-CREF. SRAs not only ease your current tax bite, they offer an easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in before-tax dollars, you pay less in taxes now. And since earnings on your SRAs are tax deferred, your money works even harder for you.

What else do SRAs offer? The investment choice, flexibility, and expertise of TIAA-CREF—America's foremost retirement organization.

Why write off the chance for a more rewarding retirement? Stop by your benefits office or call us at 1 800 842-2888 and find out how TIAA-CREF SRAs can help you enjoy many happy returns.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Wildcat basketball team's fairy-tale season followed more along the lines of a suspense novel. It was an auspicious beginning with a surprise twist to the ending paragraph.

After the women's basketball team lost Coach Brian Agler and forfeited 11 wins due to alleged NCAA violations last season, neither the team nor the players expected to be in contention for the first Big 12 Champion title.

"A year ago at this time we were all at home," senior forward Andria Jones said. "This is unbelievable to be a part of the Big 12 and to be in the championship game in our first season. We never even got past the first round in the previous years that our seniors were in the Big 8."

New head coach Deb Patterson told the players their hard work could pay off, and senior guard Missy Decker said that it definitely has.

"Everybody put a lot of faith in Coach Patterson and what she was going to bring to this program," Decker said. "I'm really proud of how much this team has progressed over the season."

Patterson arrived in April with a new coaching staff and a new system. No one, least of all Patterson, expected to be awaiting a possible NCAA Tournament bid in 1997.

"We never could have imagined our success," Patterson said. "We thought our preseason pick of No. 10 (in the Big 12) was reasonable. I attribute our success to a team who's committed to the system, worked hard, and competed, game in and game out."

Patterson has brought with her a coaching staff consisting of an Olympian, a Kodak District V all-American and a Region IV Coach of the Year.

John Farrell and Mark Moessner, presidential and vice presidential candidates, are trying to make their dream a reality.

Farrell, sophomore in secondary education, said he truly feels they are head and shoulders above the rest of the candidates.

"We are the front runners right now as I see it," he said.

Farrell and Moessner, senior in architectural engineering, are running a grassroots campaign.

"The people do our campaigning for us. Right now we have about 150 people working for and under us," Farrell said.

Students from the College of Engineering to the College of Business Administration support their campaign, he said.

Farrell's experience as homeroom representative to student council in seventh grade, and Moessner's Future Business Leaders of America trip in high school are the only political qualifications the two candidates bring with them into the campaign.

Candidates use team approach to problem solving

STORY BY BRANDON ROMBERGER • PHOTO BY BRANDON WHITE

If Aaron Otto and Amy Knedlik are elected to the offices of student body president and vice president, they won't have far to move.

Aaron Otto, senior in political science, and Amy Knedlik, junior in accounting and business administration, have been involved with student government for the past few years. Otto is the vice president of the student body. He was elected last year as the running mate of Chris Hansen.

Knedlik is the attorney general of Student Governing Association. She oversees five boards that make up the judicial branch of SGA.

"Aaron and I have been in student government for three and four years, respectively," Knedlik said.

"We have a team approach to solving problems. We do a lot of balancing out ideas. We almost get to the point where we can finish each other's sentences," Otto said.

Otto and Knedlik have five issues that they want to address in the election. The first issue they

• POLICE ELIMINATE RAMSEY'S GROWN CHILDREN AS SUSPECTS.

BOULDER, Colo. — Two adult siblings of JonBenet Ramsey have been eliminated as potential suspects in the slaying of the 6-year-old beauty queen, authorities said today.

A Boulder city spokesman said he was making the announcement that Melinda and John Andrew Ramsey were no longer under suspicion to relieve them of stress caused by inappropriate speculation.

Authorities have not identified a suspect.

• BILLS WOULD MAKE ENGLISH STATE'S OFFICIAL LANGUAGE.

TOPEKA — English would be the official language of Kansas under two bills being considered by a Senate committee. One bill, sponsored by Sen. Janice Hardenburger, R-Haddam, has 21 Senate Republican co-sponsors.

"This bill simply means that the official, public business of governing will be conducted in English," Hardenburger told the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee on Thursday.

"It does not legislate the use of English outside of government," she said. The other, sponsored by Sen. Tim Huelskamp, R-Fowler, has 17 Senate Republican co-sponsors.

"The vast majority of the people of southwest Kansas strongly favor designating English as the official language," Huelskamp said. "We must empower immigrants by encouraging them to learn English, the language of opportunity."

Phillip DeLaTorre, a professor at the University of Kansas Law School, was among those who testified against the bills.

"I come only as a Kansan who is concerned that his state government is about to make a serious mistake," said DeLaTorre, a native of Chanute.

• BROWNS FILE NOTICE OF APPEAL JUDGE'S CUSTODY DECISION.

SANTA ANA, Calif. — The parents of the late Nicole Brown Simpson have taken their first step to appeal a judge's decision returning her two children to O.J. Simpson.

Louis and Juditha Brown filed a notice in Superior Court on Tuesday saying they plan to appeal the December ruling by Judge Nancy Wieben Stock that grants Simpson custody of Sydney, 11, and Justin, 8.

Simpson won custody after he was acquitted of murdering his ex-wife and Ronald Goldman, but before a civil jury found him responsible for the 1994 slayings.

• SOLDIERS AND CITIZENS BEGIN FIGHTING IN ALBANIA.

SARANDA, Albania — Soldiers and heavily armed civilians fired on each other across a river and government warplanes bombed a mountain village, marking the beginning of open warfare in this divided Balkan nation.

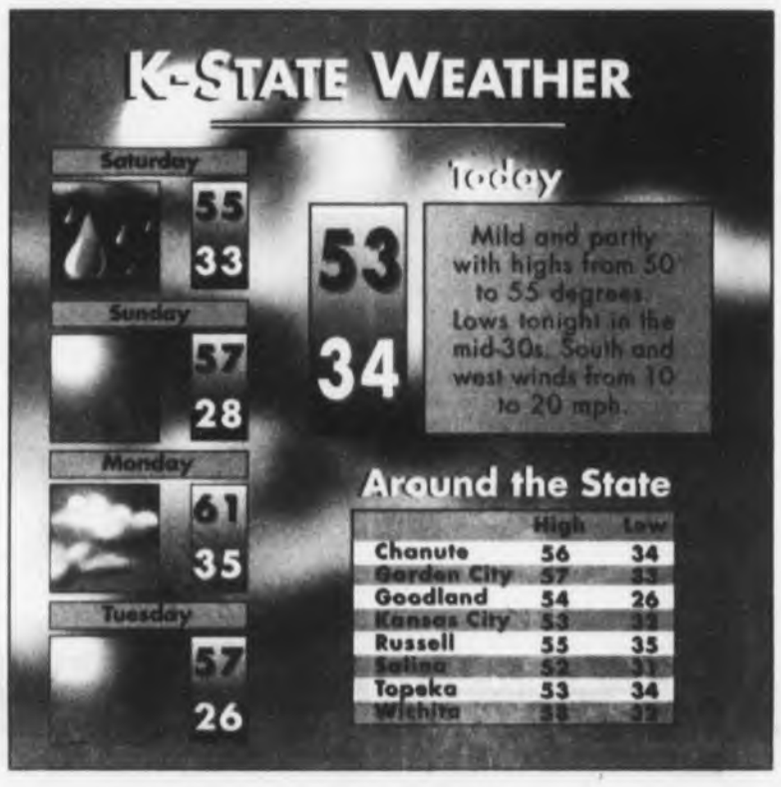
"This is it! We are now at war!" militant Ardian Sinanis yelled after the air attack Wednesday, squeezing off a burst from the AK-47 assault rifle strapped to his chest. "We will either live or die for Albania!"

Albania's foreign minister, Tritan Shehu, said the government was intent on containing the growing anti-government revolt without force, but the deployment of jets, tanks and armored personnel carriers Wednesday showed President Sali Berisha's determination to end the insurrection quickly.

• PERUVIAN REBELS REFUSE TO CONTINUE PEACE TALKS.

LIMA, Peru — Rebels holding 72 hostages in the Japanese ambassador's residence called off Friday's peace talks, saying the government has been secretly digging a tunnel under the complex.

Rebel leader Nestor Cerpa said the hostage-takers began hearing noises three days ago and that they intensified Thursday morning. He accused police of planning a coordinated attack from above and below ground.



Police had no response to the claim by the Tupac Amaru rebels, who have held the hostages since they raided a swank diplomatic reception on Dec. 17. The rebels are demanding freedom for hundreds of their jailed comrades, a condition President Alberto Fujimori has refused to accept.

▶ CORRECTIONS AND CLARIFICATIONS

Due to a reporter's errors, an article titled "Singing Farewell" in Wednesday's edition of the Collegian had several factual mistakes. The operetta, not opera, "Die.Fledermaus" was written by Johann Strauss Jr., not Johann Sebastian Bach. The performance, in McCain Auditorium, will be at 8 p.m. March 13-15. Jenny Huston, senior in theater, is the stage manager. The Collegian regrets these errors.

Senate increases Union budget

▶ Senate coverage. For more Student Senate coverage, read Monday's Collegian.

BENJAMIN YODER
staff reporter

Student Senate increased the K-State Student Union budget more than $175,000 Thursday night.

The bill, which passed by two votes, set the budget at $1,123,963.

Jake Breeding, Senate privilege fee chair, said the Union would still be operating in a deficit even with the increase.

Union Director Bernard Pitts said the increase was needed to offset the federal minimum wage increase.

Pitts said the Union has been operating in a deficit since the early 1990s, but has tried to make internal cuts to bring them back into the black.

He said the fee increase will pay for the raises, but the Union will still have to reduce some services and increase some user fees because of other increases in operating costs.

"We're trying to experiment to find the right balance," he said.

Senate Intern Sara Hayhurst said the Union benefits all students, and cuts in services would be harmful.

"Your constituents in the long run are going to appreciate this because their services won't be cut," she said.

Gabe Eckert, agriculture senator, introduced an amendment to cut the budget by $40,000, but it failed.

Eckert said a $5 increase of student fees was too much, and he said his amendment would save students $1 per semester.

"Students are not willing to accept this much of an increase," he said. "This isn't that big of a decrease.

"The super majority of the people I talked to said they realized the Union needed the money, but $5 was too much," Eckert said.

Robin Cates, arts and sciences senator, said the dollar decrease would not hurt the Union as much as it would benefit students. She said the purpose of the amendment was to save students money.

"The idea was to decrease student fees," Cates said. "I don't have a dollar. I care about that dollar."

1st election grievance hearing clearly establishes where the sidewalk ends

TANYA NISLY
staff reporter

The first grievance against a candidate or party in the 1997 elections was made Wednesday.

There was a grievance hearing Thursday afternoon against president and vice president candidates Bill Burns, sophomore in business administration, and Greg Miller, senior in electrical engineering.

The allegations were brought forth by Jason Ross, rngineering senator. The description of the violation was chalkings on the planters east of Durland Hall.

"It is my contention that those planters do not constitute paved roads or sidewalks," Ross said.

Burns and Miller were allegedly in violation of K-State Student Conduct Code 2.B.1., which states, "Use of chalk is only allowed on paved roads or sidewalks, but will not be permitted within 10 feet of any building entrance."

When asked if he admitted or denied these allegations, Burns responded that he denied them.

"Where exactly does it constitute where the sidewalk ends? These are paved parts of the sidewalk. I am not sure if this grievance is a legitimate grievance, or if it is out of jealousy of the sidewalk chalk position or if it is really a violation of the code," Burns said.

"I think this is a very petty, petty issue. I think what we need here is to dismiss this grievance and get a clarification from the Elections Committee on whether or not that is a viable part to be chalked on. It is a good spot, very noticeable, that is why we did it," Burns said.

After deliberating, the Elections Committee decided that the election regulations were unclear, and there would not be any sanctions placed on the party.

After hearing the verdict, Burns said he thought the Elections Committee used common sense in realizing that the rules were unclear.

"We checked the rules and thought we weren't in violation. It is sad such a petty thing has to go through such a lengthy process," he said.

Ross said that he did not have any malice toward Burns and Miller.

He said he wanted to clarify chalking regulations.

"I wanted to establish if chalking was legal in those particular locations," Ross said.

Burns said they chalked on Sunday evening, and they were not informed of the grievance complaint until Wednesday night.

Elections chairman Sean Asbury said that this is the first grievance brought forth during this election.

He also said that the party could not be held responsible for the committee's oversight.

Asbury said that there are forms in the Office of Student Activities and Services that complainants could fill out and the Elections Committee will have a hearing within 24 hours of receiving the complaint.

"Hopefully regulations will be made more clear defining what is the sidewalk, and define exactly what can be chalked and what cannot," Asbury said.

Greeks announce Homecoming partners

RACHAEL KRUEGER
staff reporter

Fraternity men extended pairing bids for Homecoming 1997 to sorority women by appealing to the needs of every college student.

Rides to class, food, movies, games, constant company and entertainment were provided by the fraternities.

The men of Alpha Gamma Rho and Beta Theta Pi took it one step further with hot tubs at the Kappa Kappa Gamma house.

On Wednesday, Kappas on campus took advantage of the picnic the fraternities provided.

Kappa homecoming chair Tracy Dieckmann, sophomore in accounting, said the level of excitement in the house is incredible.

"We're just thrilled with the pairing," she said.

Kristen Mehan, Panhellenic Council secretary, said that in general, all of the guidelines and rules were followed.

"The week went pretty smoothly," Mehan said, "especially in comparison with other years."

The greek system alternates bidding responsibility each year which means sororities will taxi and entertain in 1998.

Clint Simon, president of Kappa Sigma, said it doesn't matter who does the bidding.

"Ultimately the sorority makes the choice anyway," he said, referring to the problem of there being only 11 participating sororities when the number of participating fraternities is more than double that.

Delta Upsilon homecoming chair Eric McEachen, junior in finance and accounting, said bidding the Chi Omegas demanded a constant whole-house effort from the DUs and the Lambda Chi Alphas.

They performed skits, taxied and decorated the Chi O house, at which they said they spent all of their time.

McEachen said he was looking forward to one specific aspect of Homecoming 1997.

"Winning," he said.

A GUIDE TO SECTIONS OF THE COLLEGIAN OPINION PAGE

COLUMNS are opinions expressed by the columnists. The opinions are not necessarily the opinions of the Collegian.

OUR VIEW is an editorial written by the Collegian Editorial Board. The board meets every day and discusses editorial topics. The editorial is a compilation of those opinions and represents the opinion of the Collegian.

UPC offers voters opportunity to sieze candidate knowledge

At noon today in the K-State Student Union Courtyard, Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee will present the Student Body President and Vice President Debate.

Candidates for the highest student office in Wildcatland will be on hand to discuss campus issues and respond to students' questions.

Take this opportunity to educate yourself about the candidates and their positions. Today's is the only election forum this year. Make it count. Show up. Listen. Ask questions.

If you can't make it to the debate, access the Collegian's columns and profiles on the candidates at (http://collegian.ksu.edu/issues/v101/sp/info/election).

Our Voters' Guide will be included in Monday's Collegian, as well as our endorsements for president and vice president.

You can vote Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. All students can cast their ballots Monday and Tuesday at the Kramer or Derby Dining Centers from 4:30 to 6:30 p.m. or on Wednesday at the Union from 7:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m.

You can also vote at different locations, according to your respective majors, Monday and Tuesday. Details on times and locations will be included in the Voters' Guide. Whenever or wherever you vote, you'll need your student ID to do so.

If you don't vote at all, don't complain next year when things aren't going the way you want them to. Get educated on where the candidates stand and make an informed decision. Then take a few minutes to cast your ballot.

Let your voice be heard — vote.

• 'A DAY IN THE LIFE' PROVIDES BRAVE INSIGHT.

Editor,

I would just like to express my admiration and congratulations to the Collegian, and particularly to writer D. Scott Fritchen, for a masterful piece of writing.

I am speaking, of course, about "A Day In The Life," which gives us European-American readers a glimpse into what it is like to be African-American on the K-State campus.

To me, what makes a piece of writing great is when the writer has successfully been able to let me see another person's point of view. A successful writer allows me to walk, if not a mile, then at least a few meters, in someone else's shoes.

Fritchen has definitely succeeded in doing that.

I hope this story will be a wake-up call for us European-Americans, especially those of us who have said to ourselves, "I'm not prejudiced. I'm color-blind."

Yeah, right.

You may not be prejudiced, but you sure are not color-blind — no one is. Especially not when you are white in a class full of white faces, and only one black face is present.

You notice color. You better believe you notice color.

I think most of us European-descended students who shy away from African-descended faces are just ... uncomfortable. We do not know what to say, we are not used to dealing with African-Americans, and we are especially afraid of not fitting in, or of being attacked for being different, if we sit with a group of people not our color.

We are also afraid of being attacked for being in the majority.

But we can overcome that fear. I hope that this article's successful attempt to put European readers in African shoes will encourage more students to reach out to others unlike themselves.

We may say with our minds that we favor diversity on our campus, but until our hearts follow, and we do not feel uncomfortable interacting with others who are different, nothing is going to change.

Over the past 50 years, the civil rights movement has succeeded to changing people's minds about diversity.

Now it is time to change our hearts.

• COMPARING GHANDI TO MANSON LACKS HUMOR, SENSITIVITY.

Editor,

This refers to the opinion column in the Collegian Tuesday. I refer to Jess Louk's column on cloning.

As a former opinion columnist myself, no one knows better than me about a columnist inability to satisfy everyone who reads your column. But even I draw a line at writing derogatory comments about some really great personality like Louk does about Mahatma Gandhi.

Louk, you obviously do not know too much about Mahatma Gandhi. The greatness of Mahatma Gandhi's devotion to the practice of non-violence was the fact that he followed it in the midst of some great violence and apathy that India was in.

Despite the traumatic times that India underwent under the British, and the two world wars that he saw and lived through, Gandhi still advocated and practiced non-violence.

So in the future, please get your facts straight before you write them. At least this time around you got his name right instead of misspelling it. I am thinking that putting Gaddafi, Saddam Hussein and Manson with Mahatma Gandhi was your idea of a joke. Well, if so, it pretty much sucks! I guess if I were Mahatma Gandhi myself, I would ignore what you said.

But then, I am no Mahatma myself!

Dating needs a set of rules all its own

BILL KRAAI/Collegian

OK, hypothetical situation. During a typical Kansas City Chiefs game, Derrick Thomas decides to leap over the line of scrimmage, pick up Jeff George and plant him like a telephone pole before George gets a chance to hike the ball.

VIEWPOINT

KEN WELLS

KEN WELLS is a graduate student in theatre. You can e-mail comments to Ken at (sigma7@ksu.edu).

Sure, there are a lot of us who, on principle, would applaud the action. Problem is all those little men in striped shirts carrying whistles and yellow flags who all agree, simultaneously, that what Derrick did was wrong.

It was wrong because it says so in the rules.

There are rules for the most grotesque forms of human interaction: football, court, Congress, even war (if you abide by the Geneva Convention). Hockey allegedly has rules, although few professional players seem to be aware of them anymore. Still, there is a level of restraint caused by the imposition of this structure, this code of conduct, which makes an order out of the chaos.

Can you think of any realms in which a rulebook might be needed?

Let me beat you to that one — dating. As it stands right now, social interaction has no explicit rules you can look up and study. There's no sure-fire way to research your missteps ahead of time.

Still, even when you don't know you've done something wrong, you can tell when you're drowning in little yellow flags that perhaps your "pas" was just a little too "faux."

My proposal is simple. Let's sell a state (say, for example — Ohio) to Canada and use the money to fund a year-long research project into delineating, compiling and annotating all those unofficial rules of social combat into a dictionary-sized handbook to put an end to all these whistle-blowing, three-alarm, large-caliber dating nightmares.

When every young person in America turns 13, they would be issued a copy of the rules and a yellow fabric flag with a fishing sinker on it to be thrown in case of a penalty. I'd suggest whistles, but that would make the games at Bramlage completely unbearable. The rules would prevent those awkward silences, uncomfortable fidgets and that went-to-the-bathroom-and-crawled-out-the-window incident we've all lived through.

For example, perhaps others suffer from this particular moment of indecision: Do men open the door for women or don't they? It's a 50-50 shot right now, but that doesn't mean you've got an even shot at making the wrong decision.

Some women find the gesture flattering and romantic, to others it's indicative of a male need to control; and it disrupts the concept of partnership in the relationship.

One way or another, I don't really mind — as long as we can establish which way it is beforehand.

Imagine, then, Rule S-718: "Neither player shall be held responsible for failure to open the door for the other player, save instance of injury, luggage or a fire drill."

Or, better yet, Rule J-032: "A player who evades social interaction with the other player for the undisclosed purpose of playing computer games in excess of three (3) hours shall be penalized fifteen yards."

I'm not sure what a "yard" is yet in this context. We'd leave that up to the rules committee to decide. I envision a panel of six diverse people (say, Stephen Hawking, Trent Reznor, Junior Seau, Dr. Ruth Westheimer, Shirley Manson and Kathie Lee Gifford) debating, amending and hammering out the final versions of the rules soon to be social gospel. They'd decide the penalties, the scoring system and the rules for substitutions (and there will be rules on substitutions).

There are a few foreseeable down sides to this plan. Before long, teams will start being formed, with strategies to weave through the rules, becoming as coveted (if not as rare) as Chiefs playoff tickets.

Secondly, the rules would have to be amended as time goes on, so not even the handbook would be permanent, and new rules would have to be learned.

And, of course, we'd need to solicit suggestions for rules from the general public to build a framework for these rules.

TOMORROW'S TODAY

Science fiction might predict a future reality

If you missed last month's showing of "Microcosmos" at the K-State Student Union, I urge you to catch it elsewhere or find it on video if you can.

Not exactly a documentary, certainly not a narrative, this beautiful film explores the altogether-alien world of insects, from the insect's eye-view (or eyes-view, I suppose).

The really fascinating thing about this movie is that it's not really altogether alien. It's about us, too.

VIEWPOINT

JEFF CHAN

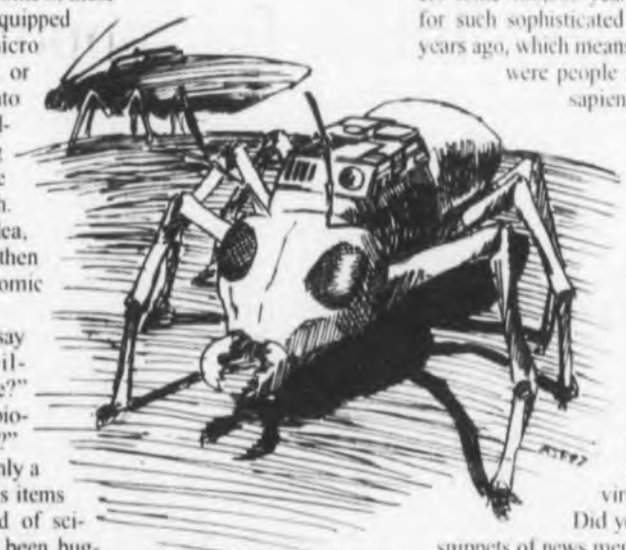
JEFF CHAN is a graduate student in English. You can e-mail comments to Jeff at (defcon1@ksu.edu)

We're a lot different from our minuscule insect neighbors, it's true. But who wouldn't be able to see a little of us in even the most alien-seeming scenes?

Who can forget the vicious one-on-one beetle battle, or the remarkable scenes of flying bees shopping for nectar? What about the riotous caterpillar traffic jam or the snail sex scene that teeters between exquisite beauty and hardcore pornography?

These were great, but I think my favorite part was the sequence where the army of biotech-enhanced cockroaches, replete with surveillance equipment and chemical weaponry, squared off against the legions of mind-altered killer fire ants. Oh, the carnage!

Uh ...



OK, OK, that wasn't really in the movie. That was in last week's newspaper.

You haven't heard? Where the hell have you been, in college or something?

In an attempt to stave off the northward advance of the feisty fire ant, and in the face of repeated failed attempts to poison the tough little suckers, scientists are trying to crack the chemical code they believe the ants use to communicate. Once we can speak with the ants, we can send them packing ... or worse.

Meanwhile, a private company in Japan is working on biotechnology for cockroaches. Their idea is to remove portions of the roach's central nervous system and replace it with this hardware, thus allowing for a kind of roach remote control. What would one use such a cybernetic roach for?

Spokespersons for the company cite humanitarian purposes — send some of these little buggers equipped with, say, micro video cameras or microphones into collapsed buildings, looking for people trapped beneath.

ADRIAN FLEMING/Collegian

A great idea, to be sure, but then again so was atomic energy.

Can anyone say "micro-surveillance device?" How about "biological warfare?"

These are only a few recent news items from the world of science that have been bugging me lately (sorry, I couldn't resist). Consider these:

- We've all heard about The Cloning — sheep, monkeys, maybe even cockroaches, I don't know. The pope has called for a ban on human cloning, but you know someone, somewhere, sometime, is going to do it. It's human nature, especially if there's a buck to be made. Imagine: 24-hour cloning stores — just insert your copy card and clone away. (Reduce 45 percent, double-sided, please.)
- The fossilized micro-organisms they found in that meteorite from Mars wasn't enough. Now, scientists have found traces of biomatter in meteorites originating in the asteroid belt. You know the theory about the asteroid belt, don't you? Remnants of a planet all its own, suggesting that the solar system may be a lot older than we thought.
- Speaking of old: archeologists in Germany have uncovered spearheads, carefully carved with stone tools, with uniform balance points akin to modern throwing javelins.

The catch is that these weapons were found in rock layers some 400,000 years old. Previously established dates for such sophisticated hunting cultures lay only 50,000 years ago, which means either our data is way off, or there were people anatomically different from homo sapiens running around long before we came about. Science fiction, yes? Nope. Science fiction is happening right now in the labs and on the streets. For too long now sci-fi has been relegated to mere entertainment by the masses. Now, don't get me wrong. I saw "Star Wars: A New Hope" like everyone else and loved it!

But did you know that sci-fi foretold the moon landing, the ring of communication satellites our global village depends upon, virtual reality and the Internet itself? Did you know that sci-fi foretold all the snippets of news mentioned above, and more?

Why, H.P. Lovecraft himself, one of America's earliest (and most underrated) science fiction writers, wrote about ancient races from near-space, pre-human earthling civilizations and genetic engineering. Of course, Lovecraft was better known as a writer of unparalleled horror fiction.

Perhaps we should pay closer attention to our science fiction, for it's here, as fiction, that the possibilities and ethical dilemmas and philosophical questions can be worked through before reality's unremitting persistence has a chance to turn a potentially beneficial discovery into humanity's next new horror, whether that horror comes as a threat to our physical well-being or our spiritual and psychological one.

We think we know who we are, but current events might just prove otherwise. And that ought to bug you just a little.

State education grant, student safety among top priorities for candidates this election

President

Riemann

Vice president

Neufeld

Tim Riemann and Jennafer Neufeld are running for Student Body President and Vice President for all the right reasons.

The Riemann/Neufeld platform is an ambitious, student-oriented and proactive appeal to the students who continually exercise their right to ask their leaders, "What have you done for me?"

Our top priority as student body president and vice president will be to help better the students at K-State. We are committed to working with the state legislature to develop a state education grant. The unchecked rising cost of tuition has made, and will continue to make, a collegiate education impossible for many students to attain due to limited financial resources.

We feel that a State Education Grant is a wise investment for Kansas, ensuring that quality students are not denied a collegiate education due to the income level of their family.

The creation of a Student Advisory Committee on Teaching Excellence will provide for the tactful dissemination of teacher evaluation results to students.

Committees will be created within each college to collect and summarize the qualitative evaluations of the faculty within the respective college.

The final work of the Student Advisory Committee will be published and made available, so all students will be able to read objective evaluations of their future teachers.

Adopting a plus system of grading at K-State will reward students who excel in the classroom, while granting professors greater flexibility in grading by allowing students to receive a "+" for grade levels B, C and D.

Grading will still be based on a 4.0 scale. No minuses will be implemented as a part of the plus system. The plus system provides incentive for students to work hard and better themselves academically.

We feel that student safety and enhanced classroom technology are extremely important and deserve the attention of student leaders. The Kansas Legislature recently allocated $1.2 million for technological improvements at K-State, and the City-University Annexation Fund is continually used to enhance campus lighting and safety.

In other words, advancements in student safety and technology in the classroom are necessary, important and are going to proceed next year regardless of who is elected student body president.

We will focus on the programs which provide the most direct benefit to K-State students.

We hope to make K-State the best it can be by implementing our three student service initiatives: the state education grant, the Student Advisory Committee on Teaching Excellence and the plus system of grading.

We hope that you carefully analyze the issues presented by all candidates in this year's election. We would appreciate your support and suggestions.

University provides alternatives for students on academic warning

SARA EDWARDS
staff reporter

It doesn't have to be the end of the world for students whose report cards didn't turn out exactly how they wanted last semester. K-State has programs to help bring those grades up.

There are 2,368 students on academic warning out of the 20,325 students enrolled at K-State last fall.

"I have no reason to believe it's significantly different from other schools with similar student bodies," Mike Lynch, assistant vice president for institutional advancement, said.

Students who receive below a 2.000 grade point average are on warning. K-State has set up programs to help students get off academic warning. Lynch said the quickest way students can bring up their GPA is University retake.

Students can retake up to five courses in which they have done poorly. The second grade will replace the first.

"That is probably the quickest way to have a major impact," Lynch said.

He said if students have to retake more than five courses, the original grade and the retake grade will appear on their transcript.

It takes longer for students to improve their GPA if they just opt to take more courses. Lynch said students have to do better in the additional courses they take in order to bring their grades up.

Another problem students run into is that the GPA cutoffs for dismissal increase with the amount of hours accumulated. Students can be on warning for more than one semester providing they don't drop below the GPA cutoff for dismissal.

Most colleges have their students who are on warning meet with their advisers to discuss their options. Many colleges utilize the Academic Assistance Center to help their students on warning.

The Academic Assistance Center is a starting point that can refer students to other services on campus. One such place students can get help is the Tutoring Center.

Students can be tutored from one to three hours a week free of charge, but the center offers mostly freshman- and sophomore-level classes.

Lynch said students need to get started early in the semester to get the most out of tutoring.

The Academic Assistance Center might also refer students to Counseling Services or Disabled Student Services.

The College of Technology in Salina has its own Academic Achievement Center.

"That's been real successful on campus," Loren Riblett, assistant dean of technology, said.

The College of Arts and Sciences and the College of Agriculture both rely on advisers and the Academic Assistance Center to help students.

Larry Erpelding, associate director of agriculture academic programs, said advisers map out plans with the students to improve their academic standing. For example, students may rearrange their class schedule or retake courses to help improve their GPA.

"We do try to work with each student on an individual basis," Erpelding said.

William Feyerharm, assistant dean of arts and sciences, said the College of Arts and Sciences uses the Academic Assistance Center a lot because of the college's size.

He said the college also relies on advisers to contact students on warning and residence assistants to help students.

Feyerharm said many freshmen get on academic warning because of problems studying and adjusting. He is working on a program for next year to help students before they get on warning.

Besides being encouraged to meet with their advisers, engineering students on warning are called in to talk with Ray Hightower, assistant dean of engineering.

"I know in the dean's office as well as in the department, we spend a lot of time with the students," Tom Roberts, assistant dean of engineering, said.

Roberts said the College of Engineering has its own tutoring center. Upper classmen in engineering serve as tutors. Students can also take the Personal and Professional Development class, which is not just limited to students on warning. The class deals with goal setting and time management.

The College of Architecture, Planning and Design has its own support program for students on warning. Lynn Ewanow, assistant dean of architecture, planning and design, said the college has a weekly class students on warning can take.

"If they follow what they're supposed to do, the chances of getting off and staying off warning are greatly increased," she said.

Ewanow said some students on academic warning want to change their majors, but they have trouble switching because many majors have a minimum GPA requirement. She said it is vital for these students to get off warning if they want to change.

Lynch said there are no set guidelines for what colleges do to assist students on warning.

"Each college decides how they're going to approach that, and some are more aggressive than others," he said.

17 speech team members to go to national tourney

DAVID FAIRBANKS
staff reporter

K-State's Individual Events speech team has qualified 17 students with 57 entries for the national tournament April 4-7 in Arlington, Texas.

"This has easily been our best year ever," Craig Brown, individual events coach, said. "In our district, we have the most entries in the national tournament, and our district has the largest active number of schools in the nation."

The team closed out its regular season last weekend at the District Qualifier Tournament at the University of Oklahoma in Norman. At the tournament, the team qualified 10 additional entries and one new student for nationals.

The team has already almost doubled the number of last year's entries into the national tournament, Brown said. Also, by qualifying 17 different students, the team has matched its all-time high set two years ago.

To qualify for the national tournament, students must place high in their respective events three different times.

When students qualify for nationals in four or more different events, they are then eligible for the individual sweepstakes competition. This competition decides who is the best all-around speaker in the nation.

The K-State team currently has 10 students who will be entered in the individual sweepstakes competition.

So far, the Wildcats have competed in 25 different tournaments, in which they have claimed 10 first place victories. They have also finished second in five tournaments, Brown said.

"I see the year divided into two seasons, one being the regular season and the other being nationals. Once nationals rolls around, I have a whole new set of expectations," Brown said.

With nationals right around the corner, there are but two tournaments left. One is a novice tournament this weekend in Lincoln, Neb., and the other is the Northwest Missouri State Invitational in Maryville on March 15.

These last two tournaments give the team a chance to qualify more students for nationals.

If this happens, the team will be taking the largest number of students to the national tournament in Wildcat history.

School of journalism selects new director

BECKY WINTER
staff reporter

The new director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications said he accepted the job because he felt comfortable on campus.

"I got a really good feeling from the spirit and character on campus. I liked it every time I came back," Todd Simon said.

Simon, a professor at Michigan State University, has agreed to accept the position as director of the school.

"I consider it a plum position, and I am extremely pleased," Simon said.

Simon has been a professor at Michigan State for 13 years and is serving as acting director to its school of journalism.

The selection was made after a search committee of eight members sifted through almost 20 qualified applicants, Chuck Lubbers, member of the search committee, said.

"These 20 people were all excellent applicants, but everyone in the department felt that he was the best choice for the job. It was really a consensus," he said.

Peter Nicholls, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said he agrees.

"I think what really stood out is that we were convinced he would provide good leadership, and people can relate to him," Nicholls said. "As the nature of journalism and mass communication continues to change, we need someone who can ensure the currency of our curriculum and research programs into the future."

Kristin Hermes, student member of the search committee, said she believes Simon will also benefit the students.

"Todd Simon stood out above the rest because he really wanted to talk with the students and find out about the students' experiences at K-State. I think he will be a very good resource and very accessible to the students," she said.

Carol Oukrop is the director of the school and is stepping down after 11 years as director. Simon said he hopes to follow in her footsteps.

"I'm hoping to be able to provide the type of leadership that Carol Oukrop has been providing for over 10 years and continue to build on that," Simon said.

House rebukes Clinton for supporting Mexico's conduct in U.S. war on drugs

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — In a rebuke to President Clinton, a House committee voted by a lop-sided bipartisan majority today to revoke his certification that Mexico is cooperating fully in the war on drugs.

However, the mostly symbolic measure, approved 27-5 by the International Relations Committee, would allow Clinton to waive decertification on national security grounds, thus preventing an economic impact on Mexico.

Supporters of the resolution called it a way to signal discontent with Mexico's conduct in the war on drugs and the Clinton administration's action in certifying that Mexico was, in fact, cooperating.

Rep. Clay Shaw, R-Fla., sponsor of a decertification measure, said the compromise version would send a very strong message to friends of the United States in Mexico without interrupting the assistance and trade that is established with Mexico.

"The issue before us today is nothing less than the well-being of America's children," said committee Chairman Benjamin Gilman, R-N.Y. "The importance of Mexico's cooperation with our anti-drug efforts cannot be overstated. In the past four years, drug use among American teen-agers has nearly doubled. Seventy percent of illegal drugs entering the United States come from Mexico."

The five who opposed the resolution were two Republicans, who said it did not go far enough because it still allowed for a waiver, and three Democrats.

Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., criticized the measure, calling it the "ultimate hypocrisy ... not to recognize that this drug problem is a domestic problem."

"The only way to stop the flow of drugs is to stop the demand for drugs here in the United States," said Lantos, who missed the vote.

If that happened, he said, "Mexican drug lords will vanish because they won't have anyone to sell drugs to."

Decertification is supported by Republican and Democratic leaders of the House.

For the resolution to take effect, it would need approval of the House and Senate.

Several Clinton administration officials were invited to speak to the committee just before it voted.

Jeff Davidow, assistant secretary of state for inter-American affairs, told lawmakers that Mexico's anti-drug efforts and cooperation with the United States had vastly improved over the past year. President Ernesto Zedillo's rapid firing of his new anti-drug chief after learning of his alleged links to a drug kingpin — despite the fact that the announcement came in the crucial week before the certification decision — demonstrated his commitment to the battle against illegal drugs.

However, James Milford, acting deputy administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, told the committee, "We cannot work without the cooperation and coordination and trust of our law enforcement counterparts."

A tale of two teams.

Women's team beats Hawks, 73-58; advances

▶ CATS PREPARE TO FACE Colorado in Big 12 Championship on Saturday.

STORY BY SUN DEE MILLS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — It has been said that the third time's the charm.

The women's basketball team kept the No. 9 Kansas Jayhawks from a threepeat, defeating the Hawks 73-58 in the third Sunflower Showdown of the season in the Big 12 semifinal game.

"It's undoubtedly tough to line up against a team three times," Coach Deb Patterson said. "When you play a team two times, it's easy to get the idea that you've got their number. It's more of a mental thing than anything. Psychologically, it's a tough thing to do."

The Cats and Hawks hung tightly to each other for the first five minutes of the game, tying the score at eight at the 15:49 mark. Senior center Kayla Hester hit a three-pointer that was the Cats' only score for the next three minutes while the Hawks added nine.

Junior guard Brit Jacobson sank a layup and was fouled by Hawk forward Lynn Pride. Jacobson's free throw and a basket by Jones cut the Hawks' first attempt at a run with 11:22 left in the first half.

"Our execution was key," Patterson said. "They executed very well, and that gives us an opportunity to get open shots."

> It's just awesome. It feels so good getting a win against them in my last opportunity.
>
> • Missy Decker
> senior guard

Hawk guard Tamecka Dixon and forward Jennifer Trapp led a nine-point run in the next three minutes, putting the Cats down by 10, 28-18. The Cats chipped away at the lead, allowing the Hawks only one basket in the next four minutes. By the 4:34 mark, the Cats were one shy of a tie, 30-29.

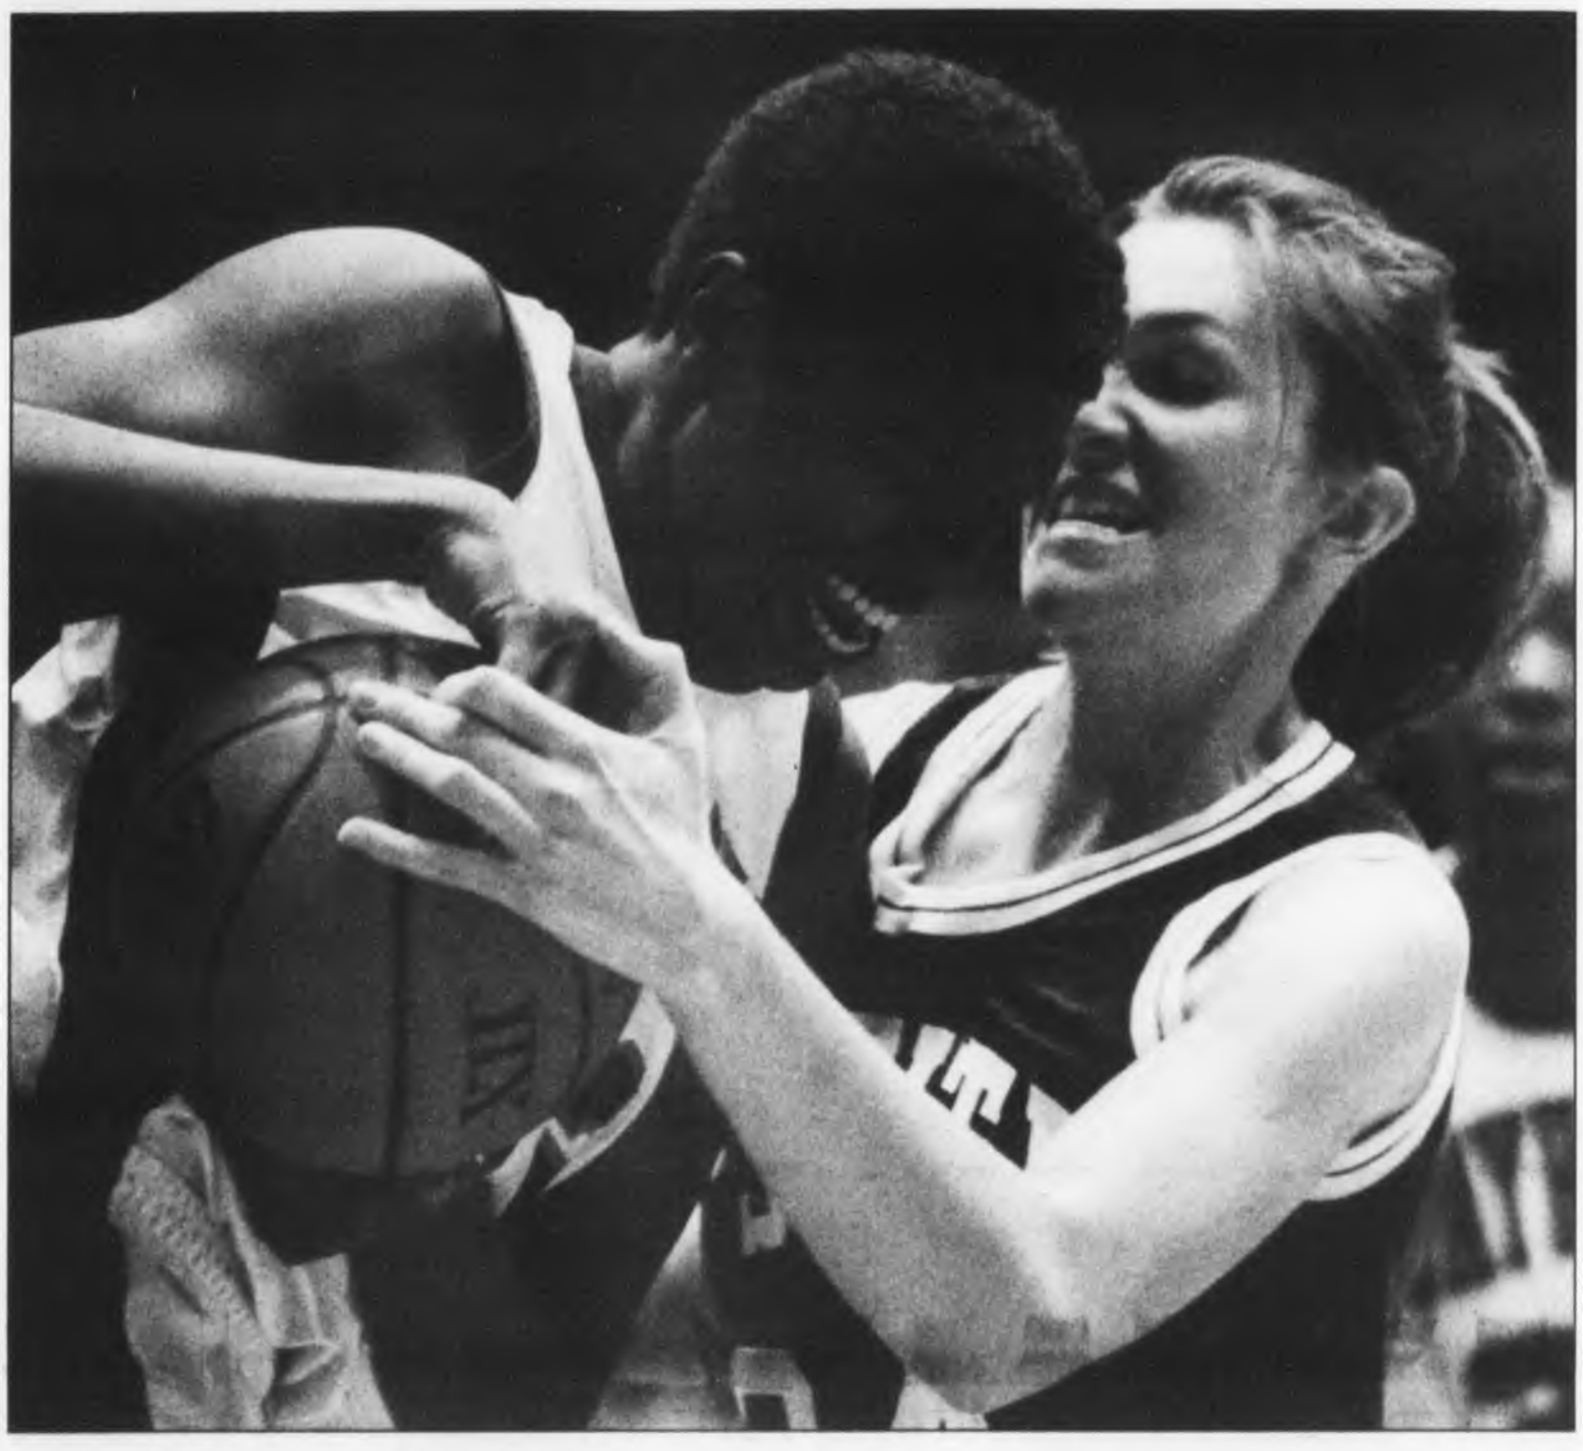
"I thought we did a tremendous job of answering the run KU made in the first half," Patterson said. "It was important for us to hold that team to one good look at the basket."

The Cats gained their first lead since the game's beginning off a jumper by Jones with 35 seconds left in the half. Hawk guard Angie Halbleib missed a three-point attempt to regain it, and the Cats took a 33-32 lead into halftime. The Cats had held Dixon, who averages 21 points a game, to seven at the half.

The Hawks came out strong after halftime, taking the lead for the first 10 minutes, but weren't as aggressive as they had been in previous showings against the Cats. The Cats were aggressive on the boards and took advantage of scoring opportunities, tying the game at 48 at the 10:07 mark. Hawk coach Marian Washington said their defense suffered at the hands of the Cats.

"Most of our offense starts with our defense," Washington said. "Defensively, we did not have a good performance tonight."

At the 7:44 mark, Jones missed a jumper, but sophomore guard Jenny Coalson, in her first Big 12 Tournament action, grabbed the offensive board. Coalson's pass to Jacobson resulted in an unsuccessful three-point attempt. Freshman center Angie Finkes grabbed the ball and sank a jumper to begin the Cats' ascent. The Hawks couldn't keep up.



"We got some big boards from the seven- or eight-minute mark down to the one-minute mark," Patterson said. "It was important, because it's practically an automatic basket for KU any time they get an offensive board."

The Cats had a 10-point lead, 62-52, at the 3:37 mark. The Hawks could only add five points to that total as the Cats went on an 11-point run. Senior point guard Missy Decker held onto the ball for the last seven seconds of the game as the rest of the team rushed the court.

"It's just awesome," Decker said. "It feels so good getting a win against them in my last opportunity."

Patterson said whether she wanted it or not, the rivalry between the two schools was ever-present. She said it was good to get the monkey off the team's back after losing to TEXAS TECH'S Gionet Cooper puts up a shot over K-State's Marcus McCollough during K-State's first-round game of the Big 12 Tournament.

Wildcats walloped in shooting, rebounds in Big 12 Tournament loss to Texas Tech

STORY BY JEREMY KELLEY

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The same thing that doomed the K-State men's basketball team all year long doomed it once again in its Big 12 Tournament debut — shooting percentage.

K-State shot just 33 percent from the field, including a lackluster 9-33 in the second half, in its 73-57 loss to Texas Tech Thursday afternoon at Kemper Arena.

"Basically it was an overview of what happened all year," Coach Tom Asbury said. "We shot 33 percent, and we're not going to win doing that."

K-State was walloped in the rebounding category 51-35, but Asbury said it was nothing new.

Tech maintained a slim halftime edge on the underdog Cats and pushed its lead to 10 with 16 minutes, 48 seconds left when Tech guard Cory Carr stuffed home an alley-oop from guard Stan Bonewitz.

On K-State's next trip down the floor, Cat forward Shawn Rhodes buried a three-pointer that got the Cats within seven with 15:48 left. But that was the closest K-State would get the rest of the ball game.

However, Tech limited K-State to just four goals in the next 12 minutes of action and strengthened its lead to a 67-48 mark with 4:18 left in the second half.

"It got real frustrating," Rhodes said of their dismal shooting performance in the second half. "We had shots we should have made."

But it wasn't just the shooting. The tandem of Carr and center Tony Battie flanked the Cats for 41 of Tech's final 73 points.

"We knew we needed to stop Carr and Battie, but they came out and hurt us again," Asbury said.

The Cats scored six straight points down the stretch to inch Tech's margin to just 13 with 2:33 left, but the Red Raiders answered right back and with a couple of free throws in and the closing minutes inched their margin of victory to 16, 73-57.

K-State appeared to be lifeless and rattled in the first half and showed little emotion as it rallied to an early 10-5 lead with 14:42 remaining.

Then it just got plain ugly.

By the 15-minute mark of the first half, K-State had tallied twice as many fouls as it had field goals. The Cats missed 13 consecutive shots and fell behind by as many as 16 after the K-State bench was hit with a technical foul at the 8:16 mark.

Battie trounced K-State in the first half, spanking the Cats for 14 points along with seven rebounds.

"Battie really makes things easy for us," Carr said. "When we needed a basket, he was there to make the easy shots for us when we need it the most."

But give credit to K-State, which didn't fold as it did against Tech in Manhattan. The Cats roared back into that contest via a 12-2 run in a period of 3:03 and got within six.

"We became a little complacent," Tech Coach James Dickey said. "We weren't getting good shots, and we weren't executing our offense very well."

K-State got within four when guard Ayome May rattled in a jumper that succumbed the Cats as close to Texas Tech as they had been since the 14:09 mark in the first half.

Guard Mark Young, who finished the half with 13 points but was held scoreless in the second, popped in a buzzer-beater that posted the halftime score, 40-34.

"It's been very depressing all year long," Rhodes said. "I thought we'd edge sooner or later, but it just never happened."

K-State finishes its season 10-17 overall and 3-14 in Big 12 play.

Tech, however, continues its quest for an NCAA Tournament berth as it faces Iowa State in the quarterfinals.

Avoid March Madness plague by tuning in the rest of the sporting world

VIEWPOINT

TARA WRAY

TARA WRAY is a sophomore in print journalism. You can e-mail comments to Tara at (twray@ksu.edu)

For all of you who have been infected with that horrible disease called March Madness, I have a sure fire cure for you — I will not bombard you with any more Big Dance hype. It's Friday, and I am sure you've had enough.

Oh no, I am not interested in basketball at all. As a sports writer, I am considered somewhat of an anomaly.

I know you are all excited for that thing they call the NCAA Tournament, but I for one am not. You all probably know more stats and names than I will ever know.

Nevertheless, I will go on.

By the time the end of the month rolls around, you will be so glutted with useless stats and Dick Vitale-isms that you will be thankful I did not start early rambling on about March Madness.

So with nothing but your best interest in mind, I refuse to spend another minute thinking or writing about the Big Dance. K-State has two left feet and won't be there anyway, so why should I, a loyal Wildcat fan, even care?

Just because that silly school down the road will, in all likelihood, be playing in the Final Four, does not mean I should care.

I certainly did not pay attention to KU's powerful backcourt, which tore up the league, or the fact they led the Big 12 in almost every stat known to man.

I know I won't be feeling any pride when the president congratulates the state of Kansas for being home to college basketball's finest. No way will I feel any state spirit.

K-Who?

I'm indeed glad I do not get carried away in those basketball office pools. Gee, if I did I might bet my paycheck on a sure fire team like Mississippi State or half of my paycheck on a bubble team like Providence. But hey, I'm no expert.

College basketball bothers me because of all the emotions those boys have. It is such a sorry sight when a basketball player cries when he wins a NCAA Tournament game.

Just because the emotion of his life's work has finally welled up after a NCAA championship win — well, that is just no excuse for tears. What are they thinking? Gasp — they are on national television. All the world will see.

I for one hate it when players play for the pure joy of the game. They should be thinking about their futures. They should be thinking about their future paychecks. Right?

Boy, am I glad I am not interested in college basketball.

There are so many more interesting things to be enamored in the sporting world.

Why, there is always Dennis Rodman. Who can ever get enough of his hilarious antics? I know I can't.

I just love it when that wacky guy punches people in the groin. He is such a riot. And what about that ever-changing hair? Who needs role models when you have Rodman?

If professional basketball is not your forte, ESPN2 always features those sports you never really wanted to see on television but they will show you anyway.

Pool is often one of my favorites to watch. There is nothing in the world more exciting than one of those stripey balls hitting one of those colored balls into one of those corner pockets.

Oooeee!! That is one wild and crazy sport. Television does nothing to capture the pure excitement of the game.

If all my attempts to sway you from the game haven't worked, and you are still determined to find more information on the Big Dance, I am truly sorry. I cannot help you out.

I refuse to make any predictions, but if by some fluke of nature or some curse of bad luck KU does not make it to the Final Four, look at the other Wildcats, the ones from Kentucky, to reign supreme in the championship game. But I am no expert.

Wait just a red hot minute, though. Don't count out perennial contenders, the University of Massachusetts Minutemen, as Final Four visitors. Led by Marcus Camby, the Minutemen will pound it out in the paint and probably be a team to bet on.

But like I said, I am not making any predictions.

So while you are enjoying the Final Four this year, I will be watching ESPN2 for highlights of all the day's exciting coverage of women's professional pool.

Stripey ball in the corner pocket.

the Hawks twice and never having been in the game.

"Certainly (the win) is tremendous for our program," Patterson said. "When you line up against a program like Kansas, it does a lot for your program. It (Saturday's final) is a tremendous opportunity for our program, and we're looking forward to it."

Jones' 28 points led the team in scoring, and for their third postseason game, four players were in the double-digits in points.

In their last meeting at Bramlage Coliseum, the Cats were victorious, 68-62. Jacobson said the day off will do the entire team — but especially players like herself, Jones, Decker and Hester, who have each played 40 minutes in the past three days — a world of good.

"Any time you get a day off, it helps your arms and legs," Jacobson said. "This Friday off will help our team as a whole."

The Cats will face the Colorado Buffaloes in the Big 12 Championship game at 7 p.m. Saturday.

Indoor track team travels to Indy for championships

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

The indoor track season comes to a halt for the K-State track and field team as it heads to Indianapolis, Ind., for the NCAA Indoor Championships Friday and Saturday.

This week Coach Cliff Rovelto and his bunch have been doing the same type of workouts as they did a week prior to the Big 12 Championships to better prepare the athletes for the tough competition.

"We have been duplicating the week prior to the Big 12 exactly," Steve Fritz, throwers coach, said. "We know they can't peak three weekends in a row, so we are taking the same type of approach."

Undoubtedly, the two favorites on the Cats' side are triple jumper Vanitta Kinard and weight thrower Renetta Seiler, who both qualified for the national competition early in the indoor season.

To their advantage, both competitors competed last week at the USA Indoor Championships in Atlanta, Ga., where they both finished high in their respective events.

Kinard said that fact alone gives her a leg up against the rest of the competition.

"I have a real advantage because I had a meet prior to this event, and I was able to stay in my routine," she said.

Kinard has the second best mark in the nation at nearly 18 meters, but she expects even more at her second NCAA Championships.

"Hopefully I will get third or fourth. That's what I'm shooting for," she said. "As for all-American status, that's pretty much a given."

The top eight finishers in all track and field events earn that status at the end of the competition.

Seiler, meanwhile, hopes to accomplish the aforementioned. Seiler was bumped from the fifth spot last week in Atlanta as another competitor threw 67 feet, two feet further than Seiler's personal record.

"Right now I'm just looking at my competition and thinking about what I have to do," Seiler said.

"I want to be in the top five, and I think if my adrenaline starts pumping and I throw really hard I can do it," Seiler said.

Seiler also wants to attain all-America status, because she was snubbed from that accolade last year.

Other K-Staters slated to perform are Keith Black in the 400-meter run; Karissa Stewart in the 60-meter dash; Belinda Hope in the 400-meter dash and Ed Broxterman and Wanita Dykstra in the high jump.

The meet in Indiana is the final meet for K-State before heading directly into outdoor competition.

"We just have to go out and perform how we are capable of performing, and hopefully we can go home knowing we accomplished just that," Fritz said.

Women's tennis team looks for 1st conference win at Iowa State

SHANE McCORMICK
sports editor

The K-State women's tennis team will try to serve up its first conference win of the spring season when it travels to Ames to face Iowa State on Saturday.

After the Cyclone match, the Cats will make their way to Columbia to face Missouri on Sunday.

The Cats come into the duals with a 5-2 record, splitting their last two matches. The team dropped its first conference match at home against Texas Tech, 5-4.

The Cats then traveled to Topeka to defeat the Auburn Tigers, 7-2.

"They were a little short-handed due to some injuries, that is something we are definitely familiar with," Cat coach Steve Bietau said. "But their top four players were pretty strong. They really gave us some tough matches."

In the Auburn match, the Cats went with a different look with their doubles teams. Playing at the No. 2 doubles spot were senior Karen Nicholson and junior Chris Schulte. Nicholson had been playing with freshman Aisha Butt at the No. 2 spot, where the duo was struggling to pick up victories. Schulte had been playing at the No. 3 spot with junior Dinah Watson.

"We just wanted to take a look at this point and see what they could do at the No. 2 spot," Bietau said. "They played better at the No. 2 spot, but the question is what will that do to the No. 3 doubles spot."

Although he is in the midst of finding the right combinations, Bietau said he will not continue to switch doubles teams.

"We're not going to keep doing this on a week-to-week basis," he said. "I want to get to the point where we are settled with our doubles teams."

Last season, the Cats had little trouble with the Cyclones, cruising to a 7-0 win at home.

The Cats posted the same score against the Tigers, losing a total of only five games.

One bright note for the Cat squad has been the return of senior Nikki Lagerstrom to practice this week. Lagerstrom had been out with a possible season ending back injury. This past week, doctors gave Lagerstrom the OK to start swinging the racquet.

"She's been hitting for about a week now," Bietau said. "She's been practicing, trying to get back in shape. She really hasn't had that much soreness in her back."

Fans travel to KC for thrill of the game

SARAH BAILEY, freshman in speech, applauds during the introductions of the K-State women's basketball team Thursday night at Municipal Auditorium.

STORY BY SUN DEE MILLS • PHOTO BY STEVE HEBERT

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — It's not about winning and losing. It's about how the game is played. For some Wildcat basketball fans, the women play a game worth watching.

"It's more exciting than a men's game," Erik Lucas, graduate student in chemistry, said. "They seem to have more fun with it."

Lucas and a group of friends traveled to Kansas City, Mo., to support the Cats in the first Big 12 Tournament at Municipal Auditorium. He said the fundamentals of the game were executed more efficiently by the women.

"They're doing real stuff and not just showing off all the time," Lucas said.

Sarah Bailey, freshman in speech communications, said she is a big fan of women's basketball. Her friend Kenda Stewart, freshman in modern languages, came up with the idea to carry a dry-erase board to every game.

"We actually went to buy posterboard at Wal-Mart, and the dry-erase board was next to it," Bailey said. "It was Kenda's idea to get it."

Stewart said she will miss watching senior forward Andria Jones next year.

"I played inside in high school, so I watch her a lot," Stewart said. "She's so tough."

One person appearing at the Kansas game said he could safely be called a K-State women's basketball fan: head football coach Bill Snyder.

"It's been fantastic to see what they've done this year," Snyder said. "They play so well together and are unselfish. They're a joy to watch."

People have compared what Coach Deb Patterson has done for the women this year to what Snyder has done for the football team. Snyder said he was flattered.

"I'm honored that anyone would do that," Snyder said. "She's an extremely good basketball coach and an awfully fine lady."

Patterson hails from Vanderbilt University, where it is not uncommon to see 10,000 to 15,000 people at a women's game. A record 9,736 attended the K-State-Kansas game in Bramlage Coliseum Feb. 22.

Patterson said the fan support would be at the heart of the program in years to come.

"Nothing is more rewarding than to walk into an arena and see young girls watching young women compete," Patterson said. "We want these girls to see players like our senior class as role models. It's one of the neatest things going."

ROAD

"The coaching staff is tremendous," Decker said. "They are good players who have been where we are and understand how to communicate with us in practices. They have a lot to teach us."

Associate head coach Kamie Ethridge served as an assistant with Patterson at Vanderbilt for five years. She played guard at Texas and captained the 1986 national championship team, winning most valuable player honors. In 1988, she joined Team USA to win a gold medal in Seoul, South Korea.

Bridgett Bonds Williams had a standout college career, leading the Southern Illinois University at Carbondale to undefeated seasons and the NCAA Tournament in 1986 and 1987. Sue Serafini coached at Division III Scranton and in her year as interim coach, she led the Lady Royals to a 24-0 season, their first undefeated regular season in the history of the program.

"These coaches have experience at being in high-level game situations as well as coaching at the highest levels," Patterson said. "It is crucial to have people by your side with those abilities."

Patterson changed the style of playing for the veterans by initiating a 3-2 post-offense system, similar to the offense run by the Chicago Bulls. The older players have adapted well, and the younger ones have learned quickly, Patterson said.

"This style of offense gives a team one, two, possibly three different looks at the basket if it's run correctly," Patterson said. "Everyone's risen to the challenge of adapting to it."

The Cats have bonded together on the court to take teams throughout the season out of their offensive and defensive comfort zones. Ranking second in the Big 12 in scoring defense, the Cats have only allowed their opponents an average of 58.1 points per game. Each team in the Big 12 Tournament has talked about K-State's ability to disrupt their defense.

"I think what hurt us most was our defense," Kansas coach Marian Washington said. "When we're not pushing it up the court, it takes us out of our rhythm."

Other changes besides the new coaching staff and the playing style have Cat players' heads spinning. If the Cats receive their almost-assured NCAA bid Sunday night, it will be the first in 10 years.

"We have approached each game in this Big 12 Tournament as a one-at-a-time situation," Patterson said. "It's so important to deal with each immediate opponent. We respond to the questions about the tournament as asked, but it's not our top priority at this point."

Senior forward Jones said she would like to stay at K-State another four years.

"If I could stay here, I would," Jones said. "Coach Patterson is going to turn this program into a top-25 program, and it's going to happen soon."

The Cats' peaking during the Big 12 Tournament with wins over nationally ranked Texas Tech and Kansas demonstrates how the ball club has improved game after game, Decker said.

"I thought our chemistry and focus has continued to improve all season," she said. "It seems like our program has continued to make a step up with each and every game. We've come a long way this season."

want to work on is making teacher and class information more easily available to the public. They strongly believe students should have access to more extensive and meaningful information about instructors and classes.

"I have been around for three different presidents. When Bernard Franklin was student body president, the teacher evaluations were a big issue. We are to the point now where we can really see some progress being made," Otto said.

The second issue that Otto and Knedlik said they felt was important is campus safety.

They want to continue to build on what has been done this year.

By working with city government and University administration, the campus has received $40,000 in funding for campus lighting next year. The campus also received three new security cameras. They said they want to increase the awareness of the campus escort service.

"We are attempting to increase funding, expand the service area and move it to a centrally located building on campus," Otto said.

They also have some new ideas that they would like to see put into action. They said they want to enhance classroom equipment and technology.

Otto and Knedlik said they feel this project should be funded by the state and will push for setting up an allocations process that allows students' voices and concerns to be heard throughout the decision-making process.

Accessibility to the officials students elect is another issue Otto and Knedlik feel is important. They will work hard to revisit as many campus groups as possible. They also want to continue Feedback Fridays, which were started by the Hansen-Otto administration.

Otto and Knedlik would like to continue to improve relations with various governing bodies.

"We would like to go back and visit different groups after elections, not just when we need their vote," Otto said. "We want to make sure students' voices are heard at every level of government."

Otto and Knedlik said they think if elected they can make progress with regard to many of the issues because of their experience.

"Walking in the door we can hit the ground running. We can make big progress," Otto said.

They said they don't want to make promises they can't keep. Past presidents have had that problem.

"In the past, if the president couldn't get the Faculty Senate to agree with them on an issue, the president would lose interest," Otto said.

"It's easy for people who have never been in the position to question a person's actions. They don't realize what a big process goes into being the student body president and vice president," Knedlik said.

Otto and Knedlik said they are running for president and vice president because they like what they are doing.

"I have been around a while. I like to get issues done that benefit students. It makes it all worthwhile when a student comes up and thanks me for something I was a part of," Otto said.

other candidates because he changes the oil in his car every 3,000 miles and is quick with the remote control," Moessner said.

"I'm probably not qualified for the position, but I just want to do what's good for the school," he said.

"One of our big reasons for running was because one of our buddies bet us we couldn't get 50 votes," Moessner said.

Their campaign is based on two main issues and a third subordinate issue.

The immediate construction of a tunnel connecting the K-State Student Union to the Chester E. Peters Recreational Center is their main concern, Moessner said.

"Students are really starting to rally behind that. The whole idea is snowballing. Some of them have suggested opening the subterranean infrastructure to the public," Moessner said.

Farrell and Moessner are also campaigning to get hard liquor admitted to the K-State Student Union. Students have voiced a large demand toward this issue, Farrell said.

Farrell also said he is pushing for an outdoor water theme park in front of Anderson Hall.

Both candidates said they feel their proposals are within their means if elected.

"I think with Farrell's ancestors putting so much money into the library we shouldn't have a problem," Moessner said.

While their campaign might appear odd, Farrell and Moessner are covering all of their bases.

"We are just trying to do our part to help out," Farrell said.

SENATE

Engineering Senator Carlton Getz said if the Union did not get extra funds now, then it will need more money later.

"Don't short change them now," Getz said. "Give them a chance for the future."

Arts and Sciences Senator Sean Tomb said the Union should be operated more like a business and should find other ways to cut the deficit.

"Let them increase their prices because of the minimum wage," he said.

Cara Redhair, business administration senator, said increasing prices was not an option to increase revenue.

"If we are forced to increase prices at the Union, we are not going to have people come to the Union," she said.

Craig Korth, arts and sciences senator, said he agreed that the Union should operate more like a business.

"If they can do it out in the real world, why can't we do it here?" he asked.

Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco said the Union wasn't meant to be run like a real-world business.

He said the Union offers services that will not make money.

"Unions were established to provide a service that the community couldn't provide for profit," he said. "It's a poor business decision."

Bosco said the Union should offer a place for students to study, relax and be entertained.

"We want that sense of home — of family," he said.

▶ MOORE HALL basement band draws from the diversity of band members to create a unique sound which is Ruskabank.

The sounds of Jamaica have invaded Manhattan, and Ruskabank is leading the charge.

Playing their distinct brand of ska, this eight-piece band is like no other in Manhattan.

Music Review

Guitarist David Spiker, junior in secondary education, began playing with drummer David Darby, sophomore in architectural engineering, and keyboard player Donnyves Laroque, sophomore in music education, as a trio in fall 1995.

They added a 3-piece horn section and bassist Jayson Sullivan, freshman in business administration, shortly thereafter.

Ruskabank has gone through two other horn players before settling on the current lineup of Dave Studnicka, freshman in environmental design, on trombone; Jamie Rogers, sophomore in music education, on trumpet; and tenor saxophonist Ben Schierling, sophomore in music.

They began practicing in the music room in the basement of Moore Hall, and still practice there weekly.

The band throws all their diverse influences into one big pot and lets them simmer until the Ruskabank sound comes out.

They mix up heavy metal, ska, jazz and even Rush to create a potent, danceable mix of sounds.

"They all hate Rush, but I love Rush," Darby said.

"Everyone's kind of different. I have a total heavy metal background and some punk, but I'd say there's a lot of jazz in the stuff," Sullivan said.

When asked to describe the band's sound, Sullivan said, "We're the fourth wave of ska," in reference to ska's three waves of popularity since the 1960s.

"I'd say we're ska," he said. "With a jazz influence, because most of our guys are from jazz band," Spiker said.

The jazz influence definitely shows in Ruskabank's live set, with their impressive horn and keyboard solos.

"I love jazz. It's my favorite type of music, and everything I try to do, my part anyway, always has some jazzy sound," Laroque said. "I try to make every song sound a lot different than the other ones."

The main focus of Ruskabank's music is to make the crowd dance and have fun, and their catchy songwriting is definitely an instrumental part of that.

"Donnyves and I usually come up with the basic idea (for songs), and Donnyves will write out the horn parts. We write music for the horns so that it sounds full with just three horns. A lot of ska bands do a lot of unnote stuff, and we're not really about that," Spiker said.

Ruskabank also does covers of "Little Bitch," by The Specials and Hepcat's "Country Time."

They recently released a live five-song cassette titled "Swank!" on their own Damphool Records label. It was recorded at Bombers last fall.

They also have plans to release a 7-inch single sometime this month.

Ruskabank has played everywhere from basements and house parties to Bombers, Rusty's Last Chance, and the Wareham Opera House, to as far away as Hays, Kan., and Rolla, Mo.

They played at a ska festival two weeks ago in Rolla with the Columbia, Mo. ska-band The Secretaries and the Soulicitors from St. Louis.

"It was very sparse. There weren't that many kids there," Spiker said.

"We've been basically a grassroots band up until now, and now we're starting to venture out," he said.

Their most memorable show is the show they played last fall with national ska superstars Skankin' Pickle and Mustard Plug at the Wareham.

"Skankin' Pickle was (like) a car wreck. They were so out there," Spiker said.

"We've seen a lot of punk bands, and they kinda acted like a punk band, but I think they were pretty much the coolest band we've played with," he said.

The bands they would most like to play with include the Violent Femmes and ska legends the Skatalites.

"If I could be like the Specials one day, that would be the ultimate," Spiker said.

"I don't care as long as we're playing. I just love to play," Rogers said.

Ruskabank will be playing with Dill Records recording artists MU330, from St. Louis, on March 11 at Bombers.

They are tentatively scheduled to play with BYO Records recording artists Out Of Order and the Hippos, both from California, on April 1, and Moon Ska recording artists Isaac Green and the Skalars, also from St. Louis, on April 21, at Bombers.

DRUMMER DAVID DARBY, sophomore in architectural engineering, and guitarist David Spiker, junior in secondary education, play a number at Bombers. The eight-piece band blends a variety of musical styles to produce its sound.

"Everyone's kind of different. I have a total heavy metal background and some funk, but I'd say there's a lot of jazz in the stuff."

EMPHATIC FANATICS

In September, dozens of schoolteachers from the state of Bihar stripped in front of the Indian parliament to protest low wages. And the Defense Intelligence Agency, in a memo disclosed by the Washington Post in October, reported the emergence of a Liberian leader known as "General 'Butt Naked,'" "from his propensity for fighting naked," which he "probably believes terrorizes the enemy and brings good luck." And Meaux, France, high school philosophy teacher Bernard Defrance was suspended in January for his pedagogical game in which he removes an article of clothing each time a student stumps him with a riddle (sometimes losing everything).

Garden designs focus on energy efficiency

Need more info?
"Energy, Fantasy and Form: The Experimental Gardens of Chip Sullivan" will be in Seaton Hall's Chang Gallery until March 14. Sullivan will discuss his work at 11 a.m. today in the gallery. Gallery hours are 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Chip Sullivan's unconventional, almost humorous, approach to landscape architecture has produced some interesting results.

Sullivan is an associate professor of landscape architecture at the University of California at Berkeley. An overview of his work is in the exhibition "Energy, Fantasy and Form: The Experimental Gardens of Chip Sullivan" in the Chang Gallery in Seaton Hall.

Sullivan presented a lecture of his work and his thoughts of the world to an audience of faculty and students in the Union Little Theatre on Thursday.

The lecture wasn't so much an academic's explanation as it was part tour, part autobiography.

Interlacing slides of his work in landscape architecture, particularly with the art of gardens, Sullivan diverted to discussing his influences: European Renaissance gardens, Beat literature, custom cars and the California garden movement of the 1940s.

However, Sullivan's more academic concern for the landscape is its contribution to energy efficiency, which he began to appreciate while attending school in the 1970s during the height of the oil embargo.

"I started to look at the garden as a way of energy conservation," Sullivan said. "Translating the garden into a new form that would lessen our dependence on foreign oil."

In the Chang exhibition, Sullivan's independent work he produced while working professionally in south Florida illustrate his concerns with efficiency.

Many of his garden designs utilize the landscape for cooling effects — groves of trees and small water ponds located on a site to take advantage of prevailing winds before they enter the home. Other designs seem much more concerned with formal and spatial characteristics.

If there is an artful quality to Sullivan's landscape drawings, it could be owed to his studying in the 1970s at the Art Students League in New York. It was there, Sullivan said, he became part of a larger and vital artistic community interacting together.

The exhibition also shows some of Sullivan's explorations of Italian gardens while he served as a fellow at the American Academy in Rome during 1984-85.

Such cooling devices as earth seats (grass planting boxes) and the use of water to cool the occupant and the air, respectively, provide evidence of Renaissance gardeners' concerns for environmental comfort factors.

"The more I studied gardens, you find examples of really ingenious ways of conserving," Sullivan said. "Not only is it a beautiful garden, but it is a sustainable environment that was agrarian and produced fruit and vegetables."

The Chang exhibition closes March 14.

crazy for pets

owning pets can be challenging, fulfilling

Owning a pet can be a rewarding experience. In return for food and a good home, a pet can give a person love and companionship. But, owning a pet can also be a huge responsibility.

"I live in an apartment alone, and I never wanted to go home because I was bored there. So I got a cat. My cat meets me at the door. A cat is a big stress reliever and a source of amusement. I'm a lot happier now," Angie Korty, assistant manager of Pets 'N' Stuff, said.

Jennifer Whitlock, a veterinary medicine major, owns two dogs, Claire and Calvin. Claire is a three month-old Doberman and Rottweiler mix and Calvin is an eight-month-old German Sheppard mix.

"Pets are definitely beneficial. Just to come home after a long day and have them waiting to see you. You don't even have to say anything to them, they just come and greet you," Whitlock said.

There are many factors to consider when choosing a pet. The size, nature and level of maintenance should play a role in purchasing a pet.

"It is best to get something caged. Rabbits are popular with dorm students. They are nocturnal and sleep during the day and are active at night. So are mice and gerbils. Mice are trainable and don't need a lot of space or attention. Rabbits will require more attention," Korty said.

Some other low-maintenance pets are geckos, pacman frogs, fish, hermit crabs, anoles and scorpions. Most of these animals are small and travel back and forth from college to home well.

"Some iguanas, pythons and other reptiles can get very large. One should consider how large it is going to get before buying a pet," Korty said.

Hermit crabs are one of the latest trends in pet owning.

"Hermit crabs don't need attention. You just sit and watch them. They do need weekly baths though," Korty said.

The amount of time available to spend with a pet should also be taken into consideration.

"I don't recommend birds, because they are very sociable, and you need to spend at least 15 minutes a day with a bird. If you don't, it can cause mental problems, and they will pull their feathers out. They feel neglected. Birds are also very loud," Korty said.

Small reptiles and gerbils are some of the cheapest pets available, while fish and snakes can get expensive.

"Fish are expensive because of all the equipment you have to invest in. Snakes get expensive because you have to buy live food for them every month or so," Korty said.

Heartworm clinic to offer early warning tests for dogs

RACHAEL KRUEGER
staff writer

Attention all dog owners: man's best friend needs help to fight heartworms.

KSU's Veterinary Medical Teaching Hospital offers its 8th annual heartworm clinic 8 to 10:30 a.m. March 8 and 15.

"Early detection is the key to successful treatment," Dr. William Fortney, assistant professor of clinical sciences at the teaching hospital, said.

"If a person waits, the disease can lead to lung damage or full-blown heart failure," he said.

Spring can be dangerous for dogs because mosquitoes carrying the heartworm parasite emerge. Heartworms cannot be detected in stool samples, as many believe, Fortney said. Blood samples are the only accurate testing method.

The test costs $12, and Fortney requests appointments be made in advance.

If test results are negative, Fortney suggests preventative heartworm pills to escape risk of future disease.

"This is another example of an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," he said of lengthy and expensive heartworm treatments.

"If people could talk to someone who's had a dog in treatment, or who's lost a dog to heartworm," Fortney said, "they would say that you don't want to see a dog go through it."

THE K-STATE WOMEN'S BASKETBALL TEAM celebrates after discovering it will be the No. 10 seed in the East Regional of the NCAA Tournament. The team will play St. Joseph's at Tuscaloosa, Ala. The Wildcats gathered with friends and supporters in the Legends Room of Bramlage Coliseum to watch the Selection Special on Sunday.

For the first time in 10 years, the women's basketball team will move into the NCAA Tournament bracket. The Cats received a No. 10 seed in the East region and will be facing No. 7 St. Joseph's of the Atlantic-10 Conference. The game will be played in Tuscaloosa, Ala., at host school University of Alabama on Friday.

"This is a great, great day for Kansas State athletics," Coach Deb Patterson said at a gathering Sunday evening for friends and family of the team. "It's a super, super feeling to know that we've put Kansas State women's basketball back on the map."

Patterson said the effort put forth by the team in last week's Big 12 Tournament culminated in the NCAA invitation.

"We saw last week what this team is capable of," Patterson said. "I think we're playing our very best basketball of the year. Playing in that championship game were a group of young ladies that were playing the sixth game in 11 days. They have achieved some special things over the course of the last week."

The Cats defeated Oklahoma, No. 15 Texas Tech and No. 11 Kansas on their road to the NCAA bid before losing to Colorado in the Conference Championship game of the conference tournament. Patterson said the team's No. 10 seed in the tournament was also attributed to the last week of play.

"I was expecting a 12 or 13 seed, actually," Patterson said. "The 10 seed is due to the team's performance in the Big 12 Tournament."

The Big 12 sent six teams to the Tournament: Kansas, Colorado, Texas, Texas Tech, K-State and Iowa State. Kansas, Colorado and Texas are playing host to their first-round games.

Iowa State was the sixth team selected, and Patterson said the fact that the Cyclones were invited shows the respect the new Big 12 Conference has already gained for women's basketball in its first season.

"The committee looked at how well the Big 12 teams played down the stretch," Patterson said. "I wasn't sure they'd go this deep, but I'm glad they did."

One of Patterson's primary goals for the program was to bring the team to the NCAA Tournament, and she told them that when they first met as a team at the beginning of the season.

"I said to the team that I never dreamed the senior class would have the opportunity to make that dream come true," Patterson said.

Senior guard Kjersten Larson said the opportunity was a dream come true.

"We never would have imagined this at the beginning of the season," Larson said. "Coach Patterson set the goals, and she's one of those people who maybe reaches them a little early."

Voters can let SGA know how to vote on garage, student fees, Call-A-Ride

Three questions about student issues will appear on this week's election ballots.

The results of the voting will be the official position of the Student Governing Association.

Students will be asked how they feel about the proposed construction of a parking garage and other possible alternatives. They will have five options to choose from.

Senate Faculty Representative Phil Anderson said construction would double the price of the parking permits and if the bicycle facilities were upgraded more, students would ride to classes.

Students will also be asked how much they would be willing to pay for the construction of a parking garage.

Replacing mandatory student fees with optional fees is another question that will appear on the ballot.

Optional fees will allow students to decide which fees they would pay.

Sean Tomb, arts and sciences senator, said an optional fee system is fair because the people who use the service also finance it.

Tomb said some fees will not be able to fall under the optional-fee category, but the financing of Lafene Health Center is an example of a fee that would be in the system.

The implementation of Students Call-A-Ride will also be voted on by students. It calls for a campus-wide designated driving program.

FBI looking for man seen with OKC bombing suspects

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — The FBI is looking for a man it believes sought a remote hideout in the Ozark mountains of Missouri with Oklahoma City bombing suspects Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols, CNN and Time magazine reported Sunday.

The FBI wants to question Robert Jacques to help agents reconstruct McVeigh's and Nichols' activities leading up to the April 15, 1995, bombing. The network released a sketch of a man believed to be Jacques.

William Maloney, a Cassville, Mo., real estate broker told CNN that in fall 1994, Jacques came to his office with Nichols and a man who identified himself as Tim.

Jacques did most of the talking and did not say why they were interested in buying land Maloney advertised as "In the middle of nowhere, at the end of a rough road, at the bottom of a hollow ... there may be a cave."

"I asked the question, 'Were they looking for a place to hide?' and he didn't respond to that," Maloney said. The three men left the same day and never returned, Maloney said.

Several months earlier, Maloney said he got a phone inquiry about the land and asked the caller's name.

"He says 'McVeigh,' and I

Committee rules candidates broke expense limit

DAVID FAIRBANKS
staff reporter

The Student Governing Association Elections Committee ruled Sunday that Bill Burns and Greg Miller, candidates for student body president and vice president, violated their expenditure limit by about $900.

Burns and Miller exceeded the $574.50 limit as described in election regulations by $904.42.

The allowable expenditure limit must equal 75 percent of tuition paid for 12 linear, in-state, undergraduate hours for that semester. This guideline is set in the election regulations.

"We went through each candidates' lists of expenditures and basically looked for glaring errors," Sean Asbury, elections chair, said.

The committee found the Burns and Miller campaign spent a total of $1,478.92. To put their net cost under the allowable limit, the party deducted $915 from their total, Asbury said. The deduction came from money the party received from T-shirt sales.

The Burns and Miller party didn't try to hide their expenditures, Asbury said. All transactions were provided for the Elections Committee.

"The regulation does not say that the party must have a net cost under the amount, but a total expenditure. Each party is only allowed to spend a total of $574.50. They misunderstood the guidelines," Asbury said.

Greg Miller, vice presidential candidate, said they did not purposely violate the guidelines.

"We weren't aware that we were in violation of the rule," Miller said. "It would have been easy to hide our expenditures if we wanted to, but that's not the right thing to do."

This violation does not disqualify Burns and Miller from the general election. After the final results are tallied and sent to Student Senate for approval, an asterisk will be placed by their names.

"This means that if Burns and Miller win the general election, a two-thirds vote by Senate will be required for approval," Asbury said.

A party without a violation needs only a majority vote for approval.

"I feel the current rule needs either to be changed or clarified for future reference," Miller said.

▶ Election Violations.
The following students either did not turn in an expenditure report, or turned it in late. These candidates will be marked on the final election results with an asterisk. If elected, these candidates will have to be approved by a two-thirds majority by the current student senate in order to take their seat.

Candidates discuss importance of issues facing K-State voters

BENJAMIN YODER
staff reporter

Increasing student participation in elections is important, student body president and vice presidential candidates agreed at the candidate forum Friday.

Only 15 percent of the student body voted last year. The candidates agreed the number of students voting needs to increase, but disagreed on other issues.

Jennafer Neufeld, vice presidential candidate, said parking was a problem on campus, but she said there was a question on the ballot that would gather student opinions on the subject.

"Let the students decide," she said.

Aaron Otto, presidential candidate, said the free shuttle service from Bramlage Coliseum could be used to solve immediate parking problems, but students should decide what to do in the long run.

Adam Balzer, presidential candidate, also said the parking problem could be solved by increasing the campus bussing system. He said he would promote a bussing system paid for by students and faculty who actually use the system.

"This would be a lot cheaper than building a parking garage," he said.

Trey Hock, vice presidential candidate, said the parking problem was out of the hands of the candidates because everything depended on the city's expansion of Anderson Avenue.

John Farrell, presidential candidate, said the most important issue facing the University was not parking, but toilet paper. He said the University should have better toilet paper.

"The softer, squishy toilet paper — it feels better on your behind," he said. Farrell responded to questions about teacher evaluations by insisting that requiring the use of No. 2 pencils for the ScanTron evaluations limited the students' voice.

Balzer said something more significant than

• LUCKY BREWGRILLE SUSPENDED FOR 1995, '96 MIP VIOLATIONS.

Lucky BrewGrille was shut down for four nights last week ending on Friday by the Alcoholic Beverage Control for minor in possession violations that occurred in 1995 and 1996.

Robert Leetch, president of Lucky's, confirmed that suspension days were served.

Leetch said it's not uncommon for the ABC to require bars to temporarily shut down due to MIP violations. However, he said the ABC has recently cracked down on the time of year when it wants these days to be served.

"It's a common thing and something that will happen in more places," Leetch said.

Leetch said in comparison to many other bars in Manhattan, Lucky's receives relatively few MIPs.

Although the doors closed earlier than normal during those days, Leetch said they still kept busy.

"We took the opportunity to completely repaint the place and re-do the floors," Leetch said.

• WICHITA WOMAN SENTENCED TO 3 YEARS FOR STABBING.

WESTMORELAND — A Wichita woman has been sentenced to three years in prison in the stabbing death of her boyfriend last June at a country music festival.

Tina Springwater, 40, was sentenced Monday to 36 months in a state prison, Pottawatomie County Attorney Jeff Elder said.

Springwater was originally charged with second-degree murder, but pleaded no contest to the lesser charge of involuntary manslaughter in a plea agreement.

Elder said Springwater confessed to the crime, saying she and David Shoop, 34, also of Wichita, were arguing at the festival when Shoop dared her to stab him.

She did, but she was shocked when he passed out, Elder said.

Springwater was free on $75,000 bond until today, when she is to begin serving her sentence.

• GUNMAN FOUND DEAD AFTER 3 GEORGIA INVESTIGATORS SHOT.

LINCOLNTON, Ga. — A gunman was found dead in his home with a shotgun in his lap and a pistol in his pocket after a shootout Saturday that wounded three agents from the Georgia Bureau of Investigation.

Wayne S. Miller, 50, refused pleas by authorities and his mother to surrender, and reportedly fired several shots before a robot peered inside his window and found his body.

It was not clear how he died.

The three agents received hospital treatment and were released.

The standoff started Friday night when agents tried to search Miller's home for marijuana.

Miller, who had been convicted of selling marijuana, pointed a gun at them, Pamela Swanson, a GBI spokeswoman in Atlanta, said.

• RAPPER NOTORIOUS B.I.G. SLAIN IN LOS ANGELES ON SUNDAY.

LOS ANGELES — Rapper Notorious B.I.G. was gunned down as he left a party early Sunday, police said, becoming the second high-profile gangsta rap artist slain in the last six months.

The rapper, whose real name was Christopher Wallace, was rushed to Cedars-Sinai Medical Center where he was pronounced dead, police officer Tommy Gallardo said.

Wallace, 24, was attending a party at the Petersen Automotive Museum in celebration of the 11th annual Soul Train Music Awards on Friday night, witness Kevin Kim said outside the hospital, where dozens of friends and fans gathered to mourn.

Master editor to work with journalism students

CYNTHIA NEILL
staff reporter

For four days this week, Kedzie Hall will be home to a Pulitzer Prize winner.

Pat Stith, investigative journalist for the News and Observer in Raleigh, N.C., is this year's master editor at K-State. He will be working with students in the Collegian newsroom and guest lecturing in several classes.

Stith won the 1996 Pulitzer Prize for public service in journalism for his "Boss Hog" series. The series exposed a major problem of corporate hog farming, which is waste management. His stories led to increased farm inspections to decrease water contamination.

"We're getting someone who's recognized at the top of the profession by having won the Pulitzer," Paul Parsons, professor of journalism, said.

Stith's area of interest is computer-assisted reporting. He obtains legal access to public databases, compiles the information and analyzes it so that it is useful to reporters.

K-State plays host to a different master editor each spring. Stith is the first master editor who is not a K-State graduate.

Stith will give a formal lecture on his "Boss Hog" series at 3:30 p.m. Tuesday in Union 213.

Friday Night Live '97 showcases talent

STORY BY KIM BRUNA • PHOTOS BY MICAH ARMBRUSTER

While there was not a celebrity host or a musical guest, there was still plenty of entertainment at Friday Night Live '97, a talent show for students who live in the residence halls, at the K-State Student Union.

The talent show, sponsored by K-State, the Association of Residence Halls and local businesses, was started last year by two resident assistants as a program that would provide students with an alternative activity, and would also bring all of the residence halls together.

"We saw a difference between the two sides of campus in the residence halls, and we wanted to do an activity together so they could support each other," said Khris House, resident assistant in Goodnow Hall and one of the founders of the event.

The event was emceed by House and Darren McElfresh, the other founder of the event. The talent show consisted of eight different acts, including singing, playing musical instruments and juggling.

"We had a bigger variety this year," House said. "Last year it was mostly singing."

All participants received prizes from local merchants. Other prizes were raffled off to audience members. McElfresh, resident assistant in Moore Hall, said that the businesses were generous and gave a wide variety of prizes.

"We were very surprised," McElfresh said. "They really went out of their way."

Ben Harvey, sophomore in chemical engineering and speech, won the contest. For his act, he juggled various objects, and brought members of the audience on stage to assist him.

"I was happy that I won, but I didn't expect to," Harvey said. "I just made up most of what I said up there."

Harvey first began juggling three years ago when he was trying to learn to catch a football so he could be a receiver for his high school football team. Now, he just does it for fun.

"I juggle for little kids at schools and stuff, but mostly I do it for fun," Harvey said.

Amir Hajdar, who competed in the talent show last year, said that he was excited to do it again.

"It was so much fun last year that I decided to do it one more time," he said.

Hajdar, senior in computer science, played his guitar and sang two songs, one of which he wrote himself. He received second place. Third place went to McElfresh and Angie Carver, sophomore undeclared, who sang two duets together.

Judging for the talent show were Ata Karim, staff at University Counseling Services, Tom Roberts, assistant dean of engineering, Jeff Peterson, state representative for the 66th district and Karen Roberts, community leader.

While this is the second year for the talent show, House and McElfresh said they may give residents a chance to showcase their talents again.

"It's a possibility that we'll do it again next year," House said. "We'll have to see."

Midwestern cattlemen gather for trade show

CAMI SOWERS
staff reporter

Between 800 and 900 farmers, ranchers, stockers and commercial feedlot representatives showed up at the 84th annual Cattleman's Day Friday to learn what consumers want in beef products.

Commercial and educational booths presented information on the industry from veterinary supplies to food safety.

Cattleman's Day is the largest campus event designed to promote production agriculture.

"It's really a cross section of the entire industry," Gary Kuhl, co-chairman of the event, said.

Most of the attendees came from northeast Kansas, but there were also representatives from the rest of the state, as well as Nebraska, Missouri, Oklahoma and Colorado.

As it is in most Midwestern states, Kansas' beef industry is important to the economy.

"As we look at all the agriculture products sold in the state of Kansas, 56 percent of the cash income comes from cattle. It's well over half the total income. We view ourselves as the wheat state, but really beef is the driving force in this state," Kuhl said.

When K-State was Kansas State Agricultural College, the school sponsored a field day called Livestock Day, where sponsors presented all kinds of livestock.

Now each species has its own spring field day. In addition to Cattleman's Day, Horse Day was Saturday and Sheep Day will be this weekend.

The day began at 8 a.m. with registration. Participants looked at the booths and visited with representatives about products and services.

Speakers gave short presentations at 10:15 a.m. on topics ranging from economics of horizontal silos to an animal science teaching update.

The general program got under way at 11:15 a.m., with speeches on consumer concerns such as the preparation of beef, new products and the economic effect of the Kansas beef cattle industry.

Participants ate a steak lunch at 12:30 p.m. and the afternoon program included a tour of the KSU Beef Cattle Research Center.

The day ended with the annual Special "K" Bull and Heifer Sale in Weber Arena at 4:30 p.m.

Friday night was the Stockmen's Dinner at the Holiday Inn Holidome, where the Livestock and Meat Industry Council chose Sid Warner as the 1997 Kansas Stockman honoree for his outstanding example as a cattleman.

He is one of the motivators, Kuhl said. Warner works with Boy Scouts and 4-H members.

Microsoft debugs Web browser

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — Microsoft has posted a single patch, or program repair kit, to fix all three security bugs found in the past week in its Internet Explorer Web browser.

Without the patch, an unscrupulous World Wide Web site operator could take advantage of the flaws to wreak havoc in someone else's computer, sending instructions to run programs secretly, send e-mail in the other operator's name, or damage software stored on a hard drive.

The patch was posted late Saturday at the Microsoft Corp. official Web site and can be downloaded for free. The flaw affects Internet Explorer versions 3.0 and 3.01 for the Windows 95 and Windows NT 4.0 operating systems.

Internet Explorer claims about 25 percent to 30 percent of the market for programs to browse the Web on the Internet.

The first flaw was found more than a week ago by a student at Worcester Polytechnic Institute in Worcester, Mass. Another one was discovered Thursday by a student at the University of Maryland in College Park, Md.

The third problem was reported Friday by students at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Microsoft's repair efforts should avert any significant damage to the company's effort to catch up with Netscape, the leading Web browser, said Dan Kusnetzky, director of the client server environments program at International Data Corp. in Framingham, Mass.

He noted that bugs also have been found in Netscape browsers.

STUDENT BODY PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT.

We endorse Tim Riemann and Jennafer Neufeld.

While all the candidates we spoke with impressed us, the Riemann/Neufeld ticket was by far the strongest.

This charismatic team had a vision for improving K-State and presented a detailed understanding of campus concerns based on a platform of fresh ideas fortified by research and student input.

Their solutions proposed for disseminating teacher evaluations and implementing the plus grading system were based on balancing student and faculty concerns and were modeled after a successful system at the University of Chicago.

We were impressed with their balanced teamwork. They supported moving Lafene Health Center to Mercy Hospital on Sunset, which showed us they are already thinking seriously about upcoming issues.

Their position for maintaining affordable tuition was impressive, although we questioned the feasibility of a state Pell grant system to help students pay for college.

Their desire to decrease student apathy and their position of reviewing each proposed reasonable fee increase were qualities of strong student leadership.

Adam Balzer/Amy Grieshaber

While we chose not to support the Balzer/Grieshaber ticket for our endorsement, these two candidates brought the most intelligent and thoughtful ideas to the table.

Their innovative campaign almost shuns conventional issues for real student concerns that are too often overlooked by Student Governing Association.

Their strong stance for student accountability and the implementation of an honor system among student representatives should be investigated by the administration and SGA.

They exhibited a genuine understanding of State Attorney General Carla Stovall's campus safety task force initiatives, but other issues were less researched.

Although their issues should not be forgotten after the election, these two candidates lacked the approachability and charisma of Riemann and Neufeld.

Bill Burns/Greg Miller

The Burns/Miller ticket concerned itself mostly with safety and the development of a designated driver system, but had a minimalistic approach to other issues.

While they support keeping Lafene on campus because of accessibility, they were anti-student empowerment on other important issues, most notably the campus parking garage.

Their desire to increase safety for students on and off campus is commendable, but wasn't well researched.

Aaron Otto/Amy Knedlik

The Otto/Knedlik ticket presents a qualified pair of candidates, but we felt many of their issues showed little innovation.

The two candidates support increased visibility for student senators through visitations, but did not explain why the two of them, both senior members of SGA, have not shown substantial improvement on this issue during their other terms in office.

They could bring experience and consistency to the job, but were campaigning on issues where solutions were already set in motion by previous administrations such as campus safety and teacher evaluations.

Colin Rafferty/Trey Hock

While the Rafferty/Hock ticket brings an outsider's sensibility to the 1997 election process, we felt neither candidate had a realistic grasp on the issues.

We applauded their common sense student viewpoint and their call for a new voice in SGA, but when asked about specific issues they could not offer plausible solutions.

Both candidates complained about the lack of fresh ideas but failed to offer any.

Our View, an editorial selected and debated by a majority of the editorial board, is written by the editorial board after a consensus opinion is reached. The editorial board consists of Collegian editors and students.

You got spirit? Don't wanna hear it

School fanaticism mystifies ex-Railer

VIEWPOINT

BRANDI HERTIG

BRANDI HERTIG is a sophomore in print journalism and English/creative writing. You can e-mail your comments to Brandi at (blh0377@ksu.edu)

This whole non-spirit thing didn't start when I came to K-State. My glory days at Newton High School still fresh in my memory, I remember feeling annoyance at the fact that I had to be in marching band in order to be in the wind ensemble. Being in the marching band, I had to don a goofy black and yellow uniform and march my Funky Winkerbean-butt out on the football field during halftime for four years.

There's something about fiercely proud purple-clad K-Staters that rubs me the wrong way.

I'm not sure why, but I have been blessed with this permanent school-spirit apathy that I'm sure will get me into all sorts of trouble.

This is not to say that ours is not a good school. I certainly wouldn't be here if I thought otherwise. I just do not understand the compulsion that drives people to such lengths to show others just how totally boss the Wildcats are.

Delving back to younger days, when I first moved to Kansas, I realized immediately that you're either for K-State or the University of Kansas. I chose KU as my team of choice solely on the fact that K-State's color was purple, and that color just made me queasy. It still does.

I was never a good fan, not even at the start.

This whole non-spirit thing didn't start when I came to K-State. My glory days at Newton High School still fresh in my memory, I remember feeling annoyance at the fact that I had to be in marching band in order to be in the wind ensemble. Being in the marching band, I had to don a goofy black and yellow uniform and march my Funky Winkerbean-butt out on the football field during halftime for four years.

My response when our Railroader football team won was not extreme elation, but rather a quiet, albeit sincere, sort of "Oh. Good for them." And when they lost, I simply thought, "Oh. Too bad for them."

And I certainly felt no pride plodding around on that field, tooting "Locomotive" (better known as "I've Been Working on the Railroad") on my trumpet. My nonchalance was not a front to appear cooler than thou. It was just how it was for me.

It wasn't always this way. I eagerly embraced the high school scene when I was a freshman. I put on each piece of that band uniform with pride, even the adjustable pants. I cheered stupidly with each touchdown and waggled my polyestered butt at the opposing team.

MATT HAWKINS/Collegian

Then, somewhere at the beginning of my sophomore year I, unaware, went through some sort of "Stand By Me" rite of passage. Perhaps I grew tired of playing endless versions of "Land of a Thousand Dances" in the pep band at basketball games, or maybe I had finally just heard "Jump Shake Your Booty" one too many times. Whatever the reason, I slowly began to rid my system of any Railer spirit I once had.

And now here I am, in a land where any word against the Wildcats is sacrilege and punishable by all sorts of public backlash, which would probably include driving drunk people home from Bob's Diner at 5 a.m.

Perhaps what bothers me the most about the whole arena of school spirit is that its largest and most devout following centers around sports, instead of the real reason most of are here (which is, I hope, to get an education).

Over the winter break, the first question people at home asked me was not "How did your first semester of college go?" but rather, "Are you going down to Dallas for the Cotton Bowl?"

I would smile begrudgingly and say no, I'll just watch it on television, thank you very much. The real truth is that the day the entire football team comes over to Kedzie Hall to cheer me on as I write my column will be the day I drive 6 hours to watch them butt their heads together.

From what I've observed, having school spirit allows the fans to not only party wildly in the throes of victory, but also grants them the permission to belittle the teams when their performance falls below expectations.

I assume a large portion of K-State athletes are here on some sort of scholarship, just as are engineering, agriculture and journalism students, etc. But who's there to boo at the engineering students when they get an F on a test?

I am not a big fan of double standards either.

It's not really an issue of my lacking pride for my high school or K-State. I have no qualms about letting it be known that most of who I am now has been shaped largely by these two institutions.

The problem for me lies with all of these fans who live in their own little world of a constant win-lose game.

PAGE GETZ

PAGE GETZ is a sophomore in women's studies and print journalism. You can e-mail comments to Page at (namaste@ksu.edu)

I was supposed to be reading something or studying something else or meditating or mining for wisdom in my self-help library.

But I was busy wondering if I changed my name to Gespacho, if I would end up being called Cold Soup, because I've always wanted to be called Gespacho.

And I was thinking about how my brother's first word was Coors, but my parents don't remember my first word, although I have a pretty good guess what it was.

I was thinking about how my most profound moments have happened in bathrooms.

The bathroom has been the backdrop for eating disorders. My greatest performances of Blondie and Barbra Streisand covers were in the shower, and my first round with Clearblue Easy was in a Wal-Mart bathroom.

There were intimate moments with God, ex-boyfriends, ex-girlfriends, with myself and with drugs as well as intimate moments with creatures I met under the influence of various drugs.

I was thinking about how I spent most of my childhood being told how grateful I should be, which only meant I spent most of my childhood feeling guilty for not feeling grateful enough.

I find it really difficult to enjoy being young when I'm constantly aware that the only reason I should enjoy being young is because someday I won't be.

It is like carrying your own tombstone around everywhere. It makes it hard to concentrate on being alive.

Some people are afraid of dying. I'm afraid that either I won't die young enough and will have to watch everyone else die, or that it will be a really slow and painful process.

Carrying a tombstone around would be more of an incentive, some relief in the assurance that there is an end to this round — just a few more lashes until knock-out.

I remember a few years ago when I was at the mall just before Christmas and became overwhelmed by the inhumanity of humanity when I made eye contact with an older man.

Something about him seemed so kind that I uncharacteristically invited him to sit down. We talked for a while about nothing I can remember except that he said he was a farmer who had never been married, lived with his sister and drove into Manhattan when he got lonely.

As he was leaving, I shook his hand to say goodbye and his eyes filled up. He said he couldn't remember the last time someone had touched him.

For a long time I fought to not forget his name, but I forgot his name and now I can't remember even the eyes that enticed me to put aside my paranoia and befriend a stranger.

But I still get the same sort of toasted-soul simmer in the unnavigated regions of being when I think about it.

It made my life make sense. It made everything make sense.

It reminded me that humanity really is just one very extended family.

One of the most difficult tasks I take on, and forget regularly, is the process of undoing the us-vs.-them mentality I've developed from experiencing myself on the defensive.

Ultimately the issues get reduced to loyalties and bedpost notches, when we become so absorbed in our beliefs that we have to defend our own identity in order to defend them.

In these cases, I think the most powerful option we have is the right to change our minds. It is the freedom to realize we are wrong.

I sometimes misplace the idea that being right and doing the right thing are not only not the same thing, but one is dangerous.

My greatest regret as a columnist is my failure to dodge that tendency to polarize two sides of an issue.

It is a failure to differentiate between beliefs and the believers who present them, sometimes less than gracefully, when in most cases it is not our needs or goals that are so different, but our methods.

It makes more sense then, in searching for resolution, to seek to find what two sides agree on.

Generally if both sides think they're right, it means both sides are at least attempting to be right, which is a good start to compromise.

Trying to be right all the time usually only results in redefining right as opposed to doing the right thing, which is a little less vulnerable to manipulation.

It's too easy sometimes for passion or urgency to come across as condemnation and preaching, when often my own writing is directed at myself as well.

For example, I suggested last week we all give up Pepsico products. Meanwhile I'm having some turbulence digesting that I just cut my caffeination possibilities in half.

A good writer has to remember that putting an opinion on paper can give it an authority that makes for good wars, good evidence, good escapes and most importantly, good paper airplanes.

▶ YOUR VIEWS

• CANDIDATES SHOULD KNOW WHAT HAS HAPPENED IN THE PAST.

Editor,

I've been reading all sorts of things in the Collegian about the candidates for president and vice-president, and I am really upset.

It has become painfully obvious that the majority of the people running have no clue what goes on in student government and haven't taken the time to find out.

Anyone running for president and vice president should put at least a little time into researching what has already been done before they declare to the students that they know how to solve student government's problems.

Even candidates never in Student Governing Association before can easily inform themselves.

If these candidates had a clue, they wouldn't be suggesting a designated driver service from Aggieville or improving the information on the line schedule, because these things are already being done. I can't help but get upset when we write a resolution to increase professors' names on the line schedule, get a response from the Provost saying that changes will be made, and then hear people say something needs to be done about this problem.

Obviously, the student body, along with some candidates for office, have no clue what we've been doing despite how hard we try to get that information out.

Our candidates need to wake up. There is no simple solution to these problems and even us "professional politicians" who have been battling these problems for the last few years haven't been able to get the results we want.

Election time is always a senate bashing time. It's easy for candidates to criticize when they don't know what we do.

Maybe if they attended a few meetings or talked to some senators, they'd realize how hard it is to get input from an uninformed student body.

Before those students that actually care enough to vote cast their ballots, they might want to find out what's going on, because knowledge of SGA's activities make some candidates look completely ridiculous and makes the good candidates truly stand out.

• TEARING DOWN SIGNS CAUSES FRUSTRATION.

Editor,

I am writing in response to your article on the so-called Random Student Organization. Being a candidate for Student Senate myself, I understand the frustration that most of the other candidates must be feeling right now.

Tuesday night, some friends and myself put up about 10 signs around Eisenhower and Anderson halls. The next morning I discovered that every sign that I put up was torn down. I was very angry at whomever had done this.

Student Senate candidates are very limited in what they can and cannot do when it comes to campaigning for office. Besides talking to students in person, candidates basically have two choices in how they can campaign.

First, they can write chalk on the sidewalks. Second, they can put signs up on trees as long as they are secured on all four corners with string.

String is the only material that may be used because other posting materials, like staples, will damage the trees.

If the RSO is opposed to the signs being hung on trees, that is their right. If they want to have public demonstrations or voice their opposition to signs being posted on trees, that too is their right. If they want to tell the Student Senate that they oppose signs on trees, that is their right. What is not their right is tearing down signs that were legally placed there.

I respect the RSO's opposition to signs being posted on trees. I do not agree with them, but I do respect their opinions. All that I ask them is that they respect the hard work I have put into placing the signs on the trees.

If they really want to change the way the campaign system is run, then they should become involved in Student Government and change it through the proper means.

K-STATE WOMEN'S NCAA TOURNEY BID FOR FIRST TIME IN 10 YEARS

Cats' quest for Big 12 title falls short

The women's basketball team may have been competing as the visitor Saturday night in the first Big 12 Championship game against the Colorado Buffaloes, but the Cats' fan support gave Municipal Auditorium a home-court feel. The Cats fell to the Buffs 54-44 in their attempt to bring home the second Conference championship trophy.

"It was an honor to be in the game," said Andria Jones, senior forward and Big 12 Tournament most valuable player. "It would have been more of an honor if we would have played today the way we had played all week."

The Cats had defeated their tournament opponents Oklahoma, Texas Tech and Kansas with the top point totals for most points scored: 81 against the Sooners, 76 against the Lady Raiders and 73 against the Jayhawks. Buffs coach Ceal Barry said she attributed the low-scoring game to solid defense by both teams.

"The first half of the game was a typical championship game," Barry said. "Both teams played some very good defense. I told my team that this game wouldn't be 80-something to 70-something."

The Cats started off strong offensively, up 10-3 five minutes into the game. At the 14:38 mark, the Buffs went on a 6-0 run to bring them within one. The Cats hung onto a slim lead until Buff guard Alexis Felts hit a three-pointer to tie the game at 19 with six minutes left in the half.

"We have to give Colorado credit for the difficulties we had," Cat coach Deb Patterson said. "We started the game very well, but we let the pressure get to us for 10 or 15 minutes and made some mental mistakes."

Colorado then took the lead as Buff guard La Shena Graham hit her first trey of the game. The teams traded buckets up until halftime, and the Cats went into the locker room up by one, 27-26. The Cats were shooting 48 percent while holding the Buffs to 39 percent from

Wildcats earn all-Tournament honors

▶ JONES, JACOBSON cap off tournament run with individual honors.

SHANE MCCORMICK

K-State's women's basketball team might not have achieved the team results it wanted, but the team did boost some tremendous individual efforts.

Guard Brit Jacobson and forward Andria Jones were named to the Big 12 all-Tournament team, following a 54-44 loss to Colorado.

Jones grabbed the top honors for the week, earning the tournament's MVP award.

In four games at the tournament, Jones averaged nearly 18 points a game.

"Andria certainly deserves and earned outright the honor of being named the tournament's MVP," Cat head coach Deb Patterson said. "What she has done in a course of a week is why she is one of the best in the country."

Jacobson

After Jones was announced the tournament's MVP, she went back to her teammates and talked to them in a huddle.

"I was just telling them that to be a MVP, it isn't just a individual effort," Jones said. "It is a team effort. There are five people on the floor at all times."

With 20 points against Texas Tech, Jones led the team in scoring for the 20th time this season.

Jones' biggest game of the season came against the nationally ranked Kansas Jayhawks. In possibly her last game against the intrastate rival, Jones scorched the Hawks for 28 points and nine rebounds.

In the tournament title game, the Buffaloes defensive intensity limited Jones to just 11 points. For the majority of the game, 6'3" Buffalo forward Erin Scholz and 6'4" center Raegan Scott matched up against Jones.

"They are pretty big girls, things got a little physical down there," Jones said.

"They and the rest of their teammates did a good job of clogging up the lanes," she said.

In the title game, Jones also recorded six rebounds, three blocks and three steals.

Patterson said Jones' work habits have been a big contribution to the program.

"I really have tremendous respect for her work ethic and her continued desire to progress," Patterson said. "She has been one of the biggest factors in the rise of K-State basketball this season."

In an 81-56 first-round win over Oklahoma, Jacobson led the team with a team-high 15 points. Possibly her biggest game of the tournament came against Texas Tech.

In a 76-68 victory, Jacobson tallied a K-State individual season high with 10 assists. Jacobson scored 16 points in that match-up and recorded eight rebounds, two shy of a triple double.

"We really had a lot of people step up and make some key contributions this week," guard Missy Decker said. "Andria and Brit have definitely been two of those people."

Big 12 championship game provides new prospective on women's hoops

VIEWPOINT

TODD
STEWART
TODD STEWART is a junior in secondary education/English. You can e-mail comments to Todd at (toddvs@ksu.edu).

OK, Missy Decker, I went to a women's basketball game.

Two weeks ago at a little pie-throwing event, you and the rest of the women's basketball team invited me to one of your games.

I figured I would wait until the biggest one of the season, the inaugural Big 12 Championship game.

I think I can sum up the experience in two words: beautiful people.

One day after watching the Wildcats upset No. 1 seed Kansas on television, I got a first-hand view of K-State's most beautiful athletes playing sport's most beautiful game.

No matter the outcome, we had better players.

On that day I was proud to be a Wildcat.

I loved watching Decker run the team. She is a spunky 5'10" point guard, and she is the attitude behind the resurgent Cats. She dives for loose balls and does the little things that make the Cats successful, and she looks good doing it.

She has spunk, and spunk goes a long way.

First-team all-Big 12 selection, and Big 12 Tournament MVP, Andria Jones is the same way.

She was the best player on the court Saturday night.

She is so smooth with the ball in her hands. She's the money player for the Cats ,and her confidence just radiates to the rest of the team.

She went head-to-head most of the game with Colorado star Erin Scholz and came out the winner. Plus, any guy who knows anything will tell you Jones is an attractive woman. Photos don't do Jones any justice.

But for me, there was one player I could not take my eyes off, and that was guard Brit Jacobson.

She's a big-time player with a big-time shot. She had a great run in the Big 12 Tournament and was rewarded with all-Tournament honors. There is something about Jacobson, however, that is just so much more.

I hate to say this in print, but I love Brit Jacobson.

Off the court, she would be one of those players that you love to just sit back and watch. If I ever had to talk to Brit, I am afraid my mouth would dry up before I could get any words out.

She is the real deal.

Here at K-State, the basketball team is the complete package. They've got the skills to pay the bills, and they look good doing it.

I know for women's basketball to progress up to the same level as the men's game, we can't concentrate on looks, but I believe in giving credit where credit is due, and K-State has beautiful women. There is nothing sexist about saying a woman is attractive.

In fact, let's make an all-looks team.

Decker and Jacobson at the guards are a must.

Give me Jones and sophomore Jenny Coalson at the forwards. Coalson has got it going on. I like her.

At center we'll take Kayla Hester. She has the best smile on the team. Sue me, but I am a sucker for women with pretty faces.

To the boyfriends of this fab five — consider yourselves lucky. You are the luckiest men in the world. I would give my left arm for anyone of these attractive, all-world females. There is just something about watching hot basketball players on the court. I have always had this desire to date a woman who can beat me at basketball.

A few weeks ago I said no one cares about women's basketball. I was wrong.

People do care, just not enough people give them a chance. Go see one game, and it will change your thinking. I am the most stubborn man in the world (ask Manny Dies), and they converted me.

I like women's basketball. Thanks, Decker, for the invite.

Now I just have to find a basketball player to date.

I admitted I was wrong in what I said a few weeks ago, so don't hold that against me. You have changed me.

So, what do you sa, doy you give the strikingly handsome sports writer a chance?

I gave your team a chance; don't I deserve the same? Please?

'A Purple Affair' features Flynt

TANYA NISLY
staff reporter

It was the Wildcats v. Larry Flynt.

Flynt was a guest on KSDB-FM 91.9's "A Purple Affair" on Friday afternoon.

Flynt spoke openly about his time in court, the movie based on his life, "The People vs. Larry Flynt," and his autobiography, "An Unseemly Man."

Flynt spoke about his behavior in the courtroom, admitting that his behavior was sometimes questionable. He said the reason behind his actions — wearing a diaper to court and cussing out the judges — was never fully explained.

"You gotta remember I had been shot and paralyzed. I was in chronic pain. And here they're draggin' me into court trying to get me to give up my source.

"And I knew if I was one of the major networks or Time or Newsweek, they wouldn't be fining them $10,000 a day for not giving up their source. So, I just took the attitude if you're gonna treat me like a baby, I'll act like one."

Flynt said he was pleased with the movie, and he was happy with the actors in "The People vs. Larry Flynt."

"Woody (Harrelson) played me better than I play myself. I had some reservations about Courtney Love, in the beginning, playing my late wife because there was not very much about her that reminded me of my wife.

"But after I seen the film, I realized what a great performance she did and probably no one could have done it any better," he said.

Flynt said he thought the depiction of him in the movie was accurate and did not glorify him.

"If there is a hero in the film, it is the Supreme Court and not me," he said.

In an excerpt from Flynt's book, he says he had not looked back because he could not, but he thought that maybe now it was time.

"I thought it was time to reflect a little bit and put everything in the proper perspective," he said.

Flynt said he did not think exposure to the material he published is harmful. He said there are not any credible scientific studies to indicate that exposure to his magazines is harmful to anyone.

When asked about the role of women in pornography, Flynt said, "Without them, it wouldn't be much of an industry. These girls all pose willingly. They are paid well."

Flynt also talked about the history of Hustler magazine. He said Hustler began as a four-page, black-and-white newsletter for a nightclub chain he had in Ohio.

"A customer said to me one day, 'Why don't you publish a full-color national magazine?' I thought about it for a while, and I took a look at the competition."

He said he thought Playboy presented the ideal girl in a plastic setting that was an unattainable fantasy for the average guy.

He said he decided to focus more on the girl next door.

In terms of the First Amendment, Flynt said he did not think the writers of the Constitution had something like Hustler in mind.

"I think they did have the unrestricted right of free choice in mind," he said.

"The First Amendment is the cornerstone for democracy. You can't have one without the other. Our founding fathers were rather emphatic in saying that Congress shall make no law breaching the freedom of press."

Flynt said there is a price to pay to live in a free society and things that are not liked must be tolerated.

"I have to tolerate (Jerry) Falwell spewing his garbage from the pulpit, you know, and I think he has to tolerate me," he said.

Convicted killer gets life in prison

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A man convicted of killing his estranged wife and her daughter last September has been given two consecutive Hard 40 prison sentences that assure he'll spend the rest of his life in prison.

Russell D. Stanford, 40, would not even be eligible for parole for 80 years according to the life sentences ordered Friday by Shawnee County District Judge James Macnish.

Stanford pleaded no contest Feb. 3 to two counts of premeditated first-degree murder in the deaths of Catherine Stanford, 41, and Jamie Jackson, 15.

He also pleaded no contest to criminal sodomy with a child and aggravated indecent liberties with a child, and was given concurrent sentences of six years and five months on each of those counts.

Before being sentenced, Stanford apologized to Charles Maxwell, Catherine Stanford's father, as well as to her sister and brother-in-law and a close friend.

Donna McAlhaney, the victim's sister, said, "My family and I are very strong advocates of capital punishment, and we feel that if ever a crime met the criteria for being a death penalty offense, this is it.

"However, as much as my family and I are in favor of capital punishment, that's how much Cathy was opposed to it," she said. "And the only reason we were willing to accept the plea agreement that was entered into last month is because we know that is the way Cathy would have wanted it."

Maxwell said that contrary to what Stanford said in a court document about having consensual sex with Jamie Jackson, "The second amended affidavit states that the evidence indicates that Jamie was forcibly raped, sodomized and brutalized."

Maxwell said, "Jamie trusted this man and looked upon him as her stepfather and would never have consented to have sex with him."

Before the plea negotiations, Stanford faced a possible death sentence and charges of rape, two counts of aggravated sodomy and a second count of criminal sodomy with a child.

The capital murder charges were based on the premise that Stanford killed more than one person and killed one victim with premeditation as part of a sex crime.

According to prosecutors and court documents, Stanford told other people he was taking Jamie shopping when he picked her up at his estranged wife's apartment on Sept. 9.

He took the girl to a motel where he killed her by choking her with his hands.

He then put her body in a tub of water to make sure she was dead, according to court documents.

She died of the gunshot wound or suffocation, according to District Coroner Dr. George Thomas.

'Private Parts' paints loud-mouthed Stern as blue-collar hero

Movie Review

REVIEW BY PAGE GETZ

He has been called the anti-Christ, and he is the portrait of the American dream.

Crossing another media milestone, Howard Stern's "Private Parts," based on his best-selling autobiography, has come to the big screen.

The movie took the Little Apple on in a special midnight premiere sponsored by KMKF-FM 101.5 Thursday. Stern enthusiasts gathered in the interactive tradition of "The Rocky Horror Picture Show."

The self-proclaimed king of all media plays himself, retracing his steps in the triumph to the throne as the host of the No. 1 rated talk show in the country.

His success has made critics question the ethics of an American culture that has made a cult-inspiring radio god out of a shock jock desperately striking below the belt for attention.

His nationally syndicated show is heard by more than 18-million listeners, and he is seen in 40-million homes on his E! Entertainment TV show.

Also playing themselves are his real-life crew Robin Quivers and Fred Norris, who radiate an endearing chemistry on screen that creates an irresistible comic alchemy with Stern's uncompromising vulgarity.

Stern claims the movie is a love letter to his wife, but it appears to be more of an apology for exposing her personal life on the air. But he offers no intention of stopping now.

As shocking as his method is, it reveals a sort of pathetic humility and charming vulnerability in Stern, despite his confrontational and mostly obscene tactics.

The popularity of Stern's let-it-all-hang-out-strategy makes it evident that there is a hunger among the masses for something real, a living, breathing, farting, belching media voice, sans airbrush.

He comes across as a rather neurotic average Joe who bent as many rules as there were to bend, challenging the system in an unflinching assault on the sensibilities of his listeners.

It is the story of David and Goliath, as the little D.J. with the big mouth takes on corporate radio, and despite all odds, gets the last laugh.

For all the people who have been told they were worthless or would never amount to anything, Stern is an inspiration.

His warped iron will, aided by iron hormones, thrives, in spite of his obstacles, and in the end he gets to tell them all where to go, the most American of happy endings.

Stern proves he will stop at nothing to offend for the sake of offending.

His relentless pursuit to push the collective buttons of uncensored America has made a legend from the reject D.J. who depicts himself as just another scantily-endowed loser with a very big mouth.

ABOVE. WINNERS of tickets to KMKF-FM 101.5's private showing to Howard Stern's movie, "Private Parts," file into the Seth Child Cinema. The private viewing of the show began Friday morning at midnight.

LEFT. DRESSED LIKE Stern and armed with a bottle of Jack Daniels, Kieth Mykell, Herrington, tries to excite the Manhattan audience for the private screening of "Private Parts." Mykell, orignally from Seattle and a new resident of Kansas, was very disappointed in the audience support of the movie.

▶ AURASCOPE BY C. ERA SAILER

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) You might be fighting extremes lately. You are either a legend or destined for a room in your parents' house. Try not to get too confident in yourself. It will just set you up for disappointment when you're grounded by a reality check. Share the wealth. Don't wear it like some kind of medal. It will only alienate others.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) A financial rescue mission is on its way, so just try to hold down the fort and don't disrupt as reinforcements enter the picture. Repeat, "Going with the flow, going with the flow." There is nothing and no one to be fixed, at least not on your clock. Try to remember there is an order to it all, and it's not your responsibility.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Just because something is true doesn't mean it is the truth. It is time for some mental spring cleaning. You've been running from yourself, but you've finally caught up, and there is nowhere to hide. Don't turn an opportunity for enlightenment into either a bogeyman or something to put off. You will be both relieved and energized if you take this by the horns.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Don't be afraid to take some risks. Mischief or any form of recreation will help to re-create or rejuvenate a weary heart and loopy head. Choose Solitaire over Go Fish, but try to keep the other players up with you. You are baffling to anyone who comes too close.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Look both ways before crossing. Sound familiar? Too late, the ramifications of a whimsical rush into a shallow commitment might slap you in the face. Spare yourself the mourning of a fall from fantasy. Prince Charming is a belching fraternity reject and Sleeping Beauty was a junkie with really bad morning breath.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Do the opposite of everything that seems sensible this week. You've been taking yourself a little too seriously and who could blame you, considering the work load and wired climate your life has embarked upon. But it is time to shoot rubber bands from the top of the world, and treat yourself to some kind of spiritual enema, even if it is just chocolate.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) You'll be playing rock to the fringe dwellers of sanity that surround you. Your cut-and-dried approach will work wonders for this soggy and weed-infested collective temperament. Just be patient or arrange for a place to hide the bodies in advance. Humor a lover. Just a few romantic accommodations will pacify a lover for months and get you off the hook.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) If there has been an artificial aftertaste poking at your conscience, take a hint. It's time to step out from behind the smoke screen of obliviousness. Fear has been navigating your decisions long enough. Put your scrambling on hold, no matter what you have to risk. It is time to go inward and be willing to get totally honest with yourself.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Stop dodging confrontation, especially with family. You have a legitimate role in your own life, so stop letting others determine how you live. Your salvation is in the present. While you judge yourself as well as others for the past, you're trapped. Remember, you've stumbled into family beyond your own family that might be more of a resource when you're emotionally overdrawn.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) You're getting warmer. You might be surprised to find the rough spots in your life even out, and the shakers of your boat starting to come around. Be gentle, you're still far from calm seas. Allow yourself to be vulnerable. You might have difficulty adjusting to not having to defend yourself, but be still. There really are no more battles to be fought.

HOROSCOPES

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) You will find it inconvenient but comforting to return this week in being the voice of reason for others. Once again your shoulder will be in demand. Just make sure your own house is in order before you decide to take on someone else's, and don't forget to play. It will be really important that you get outside. Go swing on the swings.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) You are easily distracted these days and suffer a bad case of spring fever, among other fevers. You seem to be able to get away with your whims amazingly well, and others make exceptions for you. Return the favor and give someone else a break.

Two Amish brothers are willing to risk being shot at or jailed rather than wear the worldly color of orange.

"We won't be wearing that color," Samuel Bontrager said Wednesday. "We are standing on our principle."

Samuel Bontrager and his brother Joas Bontrager recently lost their bid to overturn a court ruling that says they must abide by state law and wear bright orange clothing while hunting. The brothers are a part of an Amish sect whose members have no cars, electricity or indoor plumbing. They are also forbidden from wearing bright colors, which is a sign of worldliness in a religion that demands they remain separate from the world. But when caught without orange in 1994, the brothers were hauled in and fined $50.

"We will not pay that fine," Bontrager said. "We'd rather go to jail."

Don't expect the rod to come down from their father. He supports the boys.

Design competition focuses on work outside of studio

JASON ELLIS
staff reporter

It was 9 p.m., late for most students to be on campus on a Friday. But the evening of discussion, consultation, configuration and production was just beginning at Seaton Hall.

Twenty-four students were participating in a charrette, sponsored by the American Institute of Architecture Students.

"A charrette is a short, intense design activity," Eugene Kremer, professor of architecture, said.

Teams of three students of differing years from the College of Architecture, Planning and Design were to explore the reuse of the two remaining piers of the bridge once spanning the Kansas River east of Manhattan.

Six faculty members served as advisers to the groups for the first 30 minutes of the competition.

"The advisers helped students clarify ideas and knit them together," Kremer said. "This is part of the dialogue between faculty and students and is reflective of everyone in the college. They are pleased to be involved with design and find out ways to do more."

Entries were completed by 4 p.m. Saturday, when a four-member jury deliberated for more than an hour and a half, placing the entries.

Entries were eligible for four prizes: best of show, best idea, best presentation and honorable mention. Local sponsors donated compact discs, gift certificates and books for prizes.

"It helps give the city ideas of how to care for this piece of history," Jennifer Yard, senior in interior architecture and AIAS vice president, said. "It gives them some alternative thinking."

In addition to helping the city, AIAS had various other intentions when planning the charrette.

"The entire aim was to provide means for students to do work outside of studio," Mike Bechtel, fifth-year architecture student and AIAS secretary, said. "It also promotes interdisciplinary interaction between architecture students of different years."

Learning how to work with people of various and unfamiliar personalities in a focused and intense activity is one thing the students brought away from the charrette, Kremer said.

"These students were tired when they finished this, but they couldn't sleep," Kremer said. "The excitement and rewarding feeling of having understood things they hadn't before had them elated."

The final entries, Bechtel said, will be in Seaton Court for display.

Student Senate cuts activities budget

▸ New budget means $9,000 less for certain groups.

BENJAMIN YODER
staff reporter

K-State students will be spending less money on student activities during the next two years.

Student Senate set the Student Activity Budget at $163,500, a decrease of more than $9,000 from last year.

Arts and Sciences Senator Sean Tomb said that the decrease was prudent and needed.

"It's nice to see a decrease once in a while," Tomb said.

The student activity fee finances academic teams, college councils, campus organizations and institutional services.

Academic teams will get $28,000 under the new system.

College councils will be financed on a credit-hour scale basis. Students taking 12 or more credit hours will pay $2.01 per hour. Students taking less than 12 credit hours will pay 58 cents per hour.

Jake Breeding, Senate privilege fee chair, said campus organizations and institutional services will receive what is left after academic teams and college councils get their money, but he said campus groups would not be hurt by the new finance system.

"This doesn't affect the bottom line of what is left for college groups," he said.

In other business, Senate increased the K-State Student Union budget by more than $175,000. The bill set the budget at $1,123,963.

Union Director Bernard Pitts said the Union has been operating in a deficit since the early 1990s and needed the increase because of federal minimum wage increases that will take place in September.

Pitts said the fee increase will pay for the raises, but will not help reduce the budget deficit. He said the Union might have to cut back services or raise prices in order to operate in the black.

Gabe Eckert, agriculture senator, said the people he has talked to said a $5 increase in fees was too much. He introduced an amendment to lower the fees to $4, but it failed.

Senate also approved three plebiscites that were to appear on this week's election ballots. The plebiscites will gather the opinions of students who vote.

Mandy Reese, arts and sciences senator, said the plebiscite vote was needed unless senators were willing to talk to 3,000 students.

Justin Edwards, agriculture senator, agreed that a plebiscite vote was needed. He said it was the best way to find out the opinions of students.

"We really don't know what people want," Edwards said. "I would like to see what students want."

Senate also approved the student health insurance plan. The plan will consist of two insurance categories — ages 30 and younger and ages 31 and older.

By age banding insurance into two groups, the rates for those younger than 30 drop by 16 percent, and the rates for those 31 and older increase by 20 percent, according to the bill.

Jennifer Hoit, business administration senator, said the plan will provide adequate coverage at comparable prices.

Sami Halabi, Senate operations chair, said he favored the health insurance plan because it would provide a service to students who are not insured.

"They are offering these students coverage that they may need," he said.

Graduate Senator David Hasemann said he was concerned the plan would not be in the best interests of students.

"There's not many people that think this is a good deal and there's not many people that think K-State should be in the insurance business," he said.

"We're promoting something that may not be that good for them," Hasemann said.

Senate also voted not to change its rules concerning the number of unexcused absences senators can have. Senators can miss three meetings before being impeached or offering a resignation.

The issue was raised after Clayton Huseman, former agriculture senator, resigned from Senate.

Huseman said he wanted to resign instead of going through the impeachment process.

He said he was unable to attend Senate meetings because he was involved with an academic competition team, which is an unexcused absence.

Senate Chair Aubrey Abbott said she did not like the rules, but they were approved by Senate at the beginning of the year and should not be changed now.

"I think we should uphold our rules that we've had all year," Abbott said. "I haven't bent them for anyone. Why bend them now?"

"Maybe you'll have to give up your friend's twenty-first birthday party," Abbott said. "I'm not going to sit down in that room and decide whose excuse is better."

Jason Ross, engineering senator, said that attending Senate meetings was the best way to represent students.

"Like it or not, when you're not in the body you're not representing the students," he said.

Hasemann said that academic competition teams are not clubs and should be excused absences.

"If they're going to represent this University in this manner, I think she should excuse them," he said.

Jason Floyd, human ecology senator, said some absences should be excused in certain situations.

"Maybe there are some absences that should be excused," he said.

said, 'M-C-V-E-Y' and he said, 'That's close enough,'" Maloney said.

McVeigh's trial on federal murder and conspiracy charges is set for March 31 in Denver. Nichols later will be tried separately. Their indictment alleges they acted with others unknown to bomb the Okla-homa City federal building on April 19, 1995, killing 168 people and injuring more than 500.

McVeigh attorney Stephen Jones told CNN Sunday night that McVeigh was not in Missouri at the time Maloney said he met the three men.

"Our information indicates Tim was somewhere other than Cassville, Mo.," Jones told CNN. "That's what our research shows." He didn't say where McVeigh was at that time.

With Maloney's help, the FBI produced a sketch of Jacques and has been trying to find him down for more than a year, CNN reported on its "Impact" news program, which is co-produced with Time. An article also appears in Time's March 17 issue, which hits the stands Monday.

The drawing of Jacques, who appears to be a dark-complected, muscular man with short hair in the sketch, is the only remaining unidentified sketch in the FBI's files on the case, a Justice Department source told CNN.

On May 2, 1995, about two weeks after the bombing, a drifter named Robert Jacks was arrested as a material witness in Carthage, Mo., along with Gary Allen Land.

The two were released 18 hours later.

Maloney told CNN that the Jacques he met was not the Jacks he saw on television that day. "He's out there," Maloney said. "This other guy they're looking for, he's there somewhere."

The FBI has yet to show the Jacques sketch to the witnesses at the Ryder truck rental in Junction City, where the truck used in the bombing was rented, or to people around Nichols' home in nearby Herington, CNN reported.

Barbara Whittenberg, who runs the Santa Fe Trail Diner in Herington, recalls three men pulling up in a Ryder truck a day or so before the bombing. Two were Nichols and McVeigh, she said. The third was muscular and dark-skinned.

"The one question I asked was where were they going. And the third person said, 'Oklahoma.'"

Shown CNN's reproduction of the FBI sketch of Jacques, Whittenberg said, "It looks closer to him than any of them. This is the closest picture I've seen yet."

the field.

"Our defense had been solid up to that point," Barry said. "Our offense hadn't gotten rolling yet."

The Buffs' defense centered around keeping Jones away from the basket and keeping pressure on the Cats' ball handler, senior point guard Missy Decker. Buff forward Erin Scholz and Graham had those jobs in the game.

"Coach told me to pressure Decker," Graham said.

"I tried to keep her on one side of the floor so Erin had time to find the screens," she said.

The Cats handled the pressure for the first seven minutes of the half, but at the 12:30 mark, they were scoreless from the field for the next eight minutes.

Jones hit one of two free throws, but the Buffs put 11 points on the board to give them a 48-35 lead.

"The on-the-ball pressure made it difficult to bring the ball up the floor," Patterson said. "Our timing was off a couple of beats on offense as well."

After that free throw, Jones was scoreless the rest of the game, because of Scholz's defensive efforts.

"She's a key player," Scholz said. "I couldn't be away from her for a second, because she's someone they consistently go to eight out of 10 possessions. I thought she scored more than she did."

Freshman center Angie Finkes broke the scoreless streak at the 4:20 mark, grabbing her own offensive board.

She put up two more shots and senior center Kayla Hester sank a trey with 15.4 seconds on the game clock, but the Cats came up short for the first time in the tournament.

"K-State played with a lot of heart," Scholz said. "There came a point in the second half where we said we weren't going to mess around with them anymore. I think the key to the game was heart."

Junior guard Brit Jacobson joined Jones, Scholz, Graham and Kansas guard Tamecka Dixon on the all-Tournament team.

Jacobson said Patterson was crucial to the team's success this season.

"We have to give credit to Coach Patterson for asking us, wanting us and showing us how to come together as a team," Jacobson said.

Jones said she told the team her MVP honor included every Cat player.

"When you win an MVP award, it's not just yours," Jones said. "It's a total team effort."

FORUM

ScanTron needs to be added to teacher evaluations. He said they would be more professional if students were able to voice their opinions.

Otto said the course information program submitted to Faculty Senate would answer questions about faculty and class structure.

Neufeld said changing the course information program and forming a student advisory committee on teacher excellence would improve the value of education.

Colin Rafferty, presidential candidate, said teacher evaluations were an issue that refuses to die, and students can get more information from other students in their major.

"Teacher evaluations are not the only answer," he said.

Greg Miller, vice presidential candidate, said teacher evaluations would not solve problems in education, but getting rid of faculty tenure would.

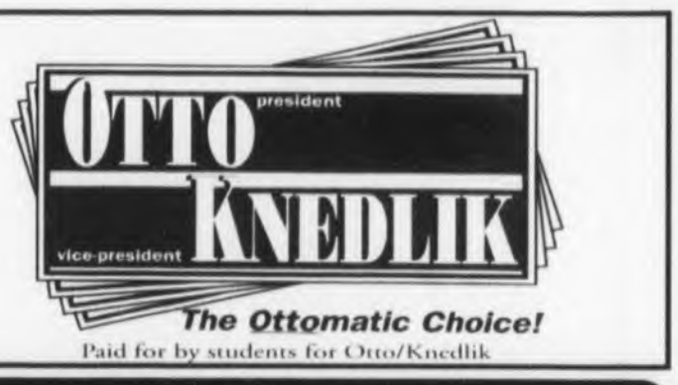
"Let's get to the heart of the matter," he said. "Tenure is the problem, not teacher evaluations."

Candidates agreed that student fees need to be controlled, but disagreed on how to accomplish this.

Otto said he and vice presidential candidate Amy Knedlik would talk to students to get input about tuition levels and student fees. He said fees needed to be looked at on an individual basis.

"You have to look at each situation and find the right balance," he said.

Tim Riemann, presidential candidate, also said students should decide how fees should be increased. He said he would talk to students and ask them their opinions before fees were introduced to Student Senate.



Amy Grieshaber, vice presidential candidate, said she would like to see and analyze statistics before student fees were raised.

Bill Burns, presidential candidate, said all students should be sent a mailer informing them why their fees were being raised and where the money would go.

Rafferty said if students don't vote, they are each throwing away $240 in fees. He said students' fees needed to be controlled.

"It's a bargain bonanza," he said.

Farrell said bringing professional wrestling to Bramlage would alleviate the burden of student fees and tuition costs.

ABOUT THE COLLEGIAN VOTERS' GUIDE

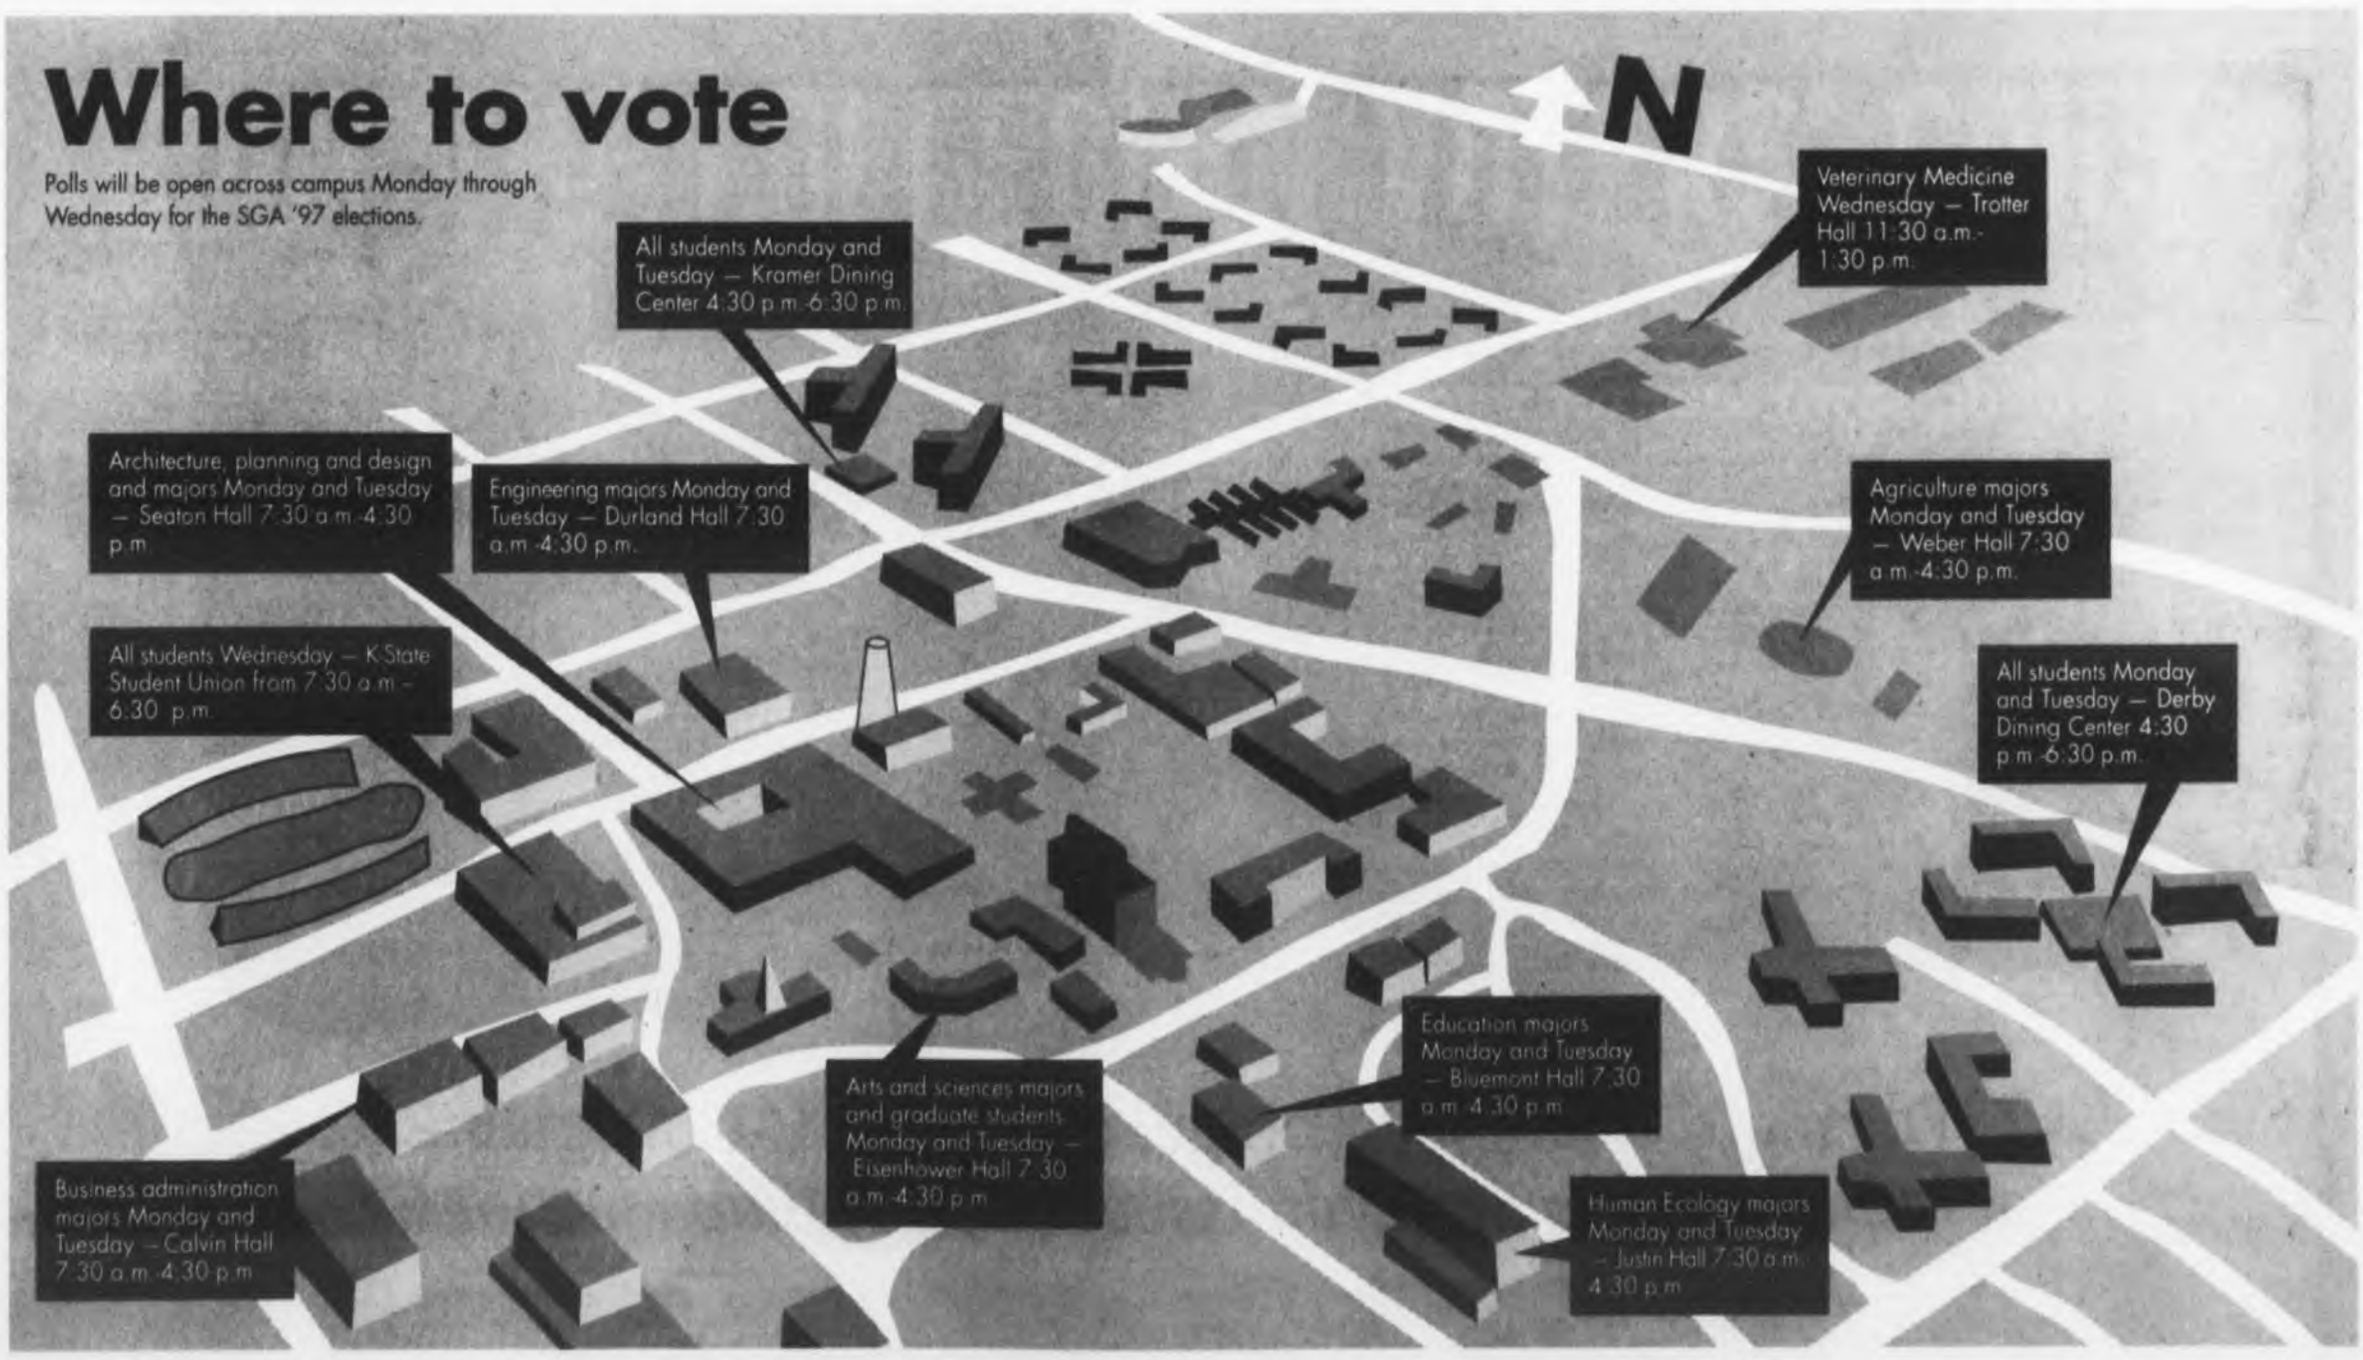
In our relentless pursuit of informing the K-State student body and encouraging students to voice their concerns in the ballot booth, we present the 1997 Student Governing Association voters' guide.

Every candidate who has taken the time to fill out our questionnaire, which is based on student concerns, is represented in this guide.

Every student should also take the time to go to the nearest voting site and select the students who will represent K-State as senators, council members, board members, and student body president and vice president.

These positions might not, at first glance, appear to affect the common student. But every member of a club is affected by Student Senate's fee allocations, every student enrolling in a class is affected by the president's efforts to publicize teacher evaluations and every patron of the K-State Student Union is affected by the Union Governing Board.

So read the words of the candidates carefully: Each candidate's words are complete and uncut. In the interest of fairness, each is also listed in alphabetical order, although the college council candidates didn't fit in the space allotted. But the college council candidates' information will be on the Electronic Collegian voters' guide.



Then use this information to make an informed decision, and get out there on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday and make your voice heard.

Voter turnout through the years

Although times and voting locations have changed, a referendum vote remains the greatest determinate of high voter turnout.

1. What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

Help students understand and be exposed to issues that will concern them and the future of their education at K-State. At the same time, we would like to improve the quality of life for students on and off campus.

2. What could you do to enhance the quality of student life at K-State?

There are three main issues we would like to work on:

1. Campus safety, which can always be improved.

2. The parking problem needs a solution.

3. The lack of communication between the students and student government needs to be resolved.

3. In 50 words or fewer, describe what makes you more qualified for these positions than other candidates.

Our ability to exert ourselves, as we always have when faced with a job, sets us apart from the other candidates. We enjoy the challenge of hard work, which is what this position requires. We have a fresh outlook on different campus issue that have lingered too long as problems for K-State students. We are determined to find solutions to those problems in our efforts to serve the students of K-State. And besides, we're good enough, smart enough and doggone it, people like us.

1. What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

The most important issue at K-State is the safety of students at our college. The main focus of safety that needs to be addressed is drunk driving.

2. What could you do the enhance to quality of student life at K-State?

To enhance the quality of life at K-State, we propose a shuttle bus system to and from Aggieville. Ultimately, this system will save lives and decrease DUIs assessed by the Riley County Police Department.

3. In 50 words or fewer, describe what makes you more qualified for these positions than other candidates.

We feel we are more qualified than the next person because of our strong upbringing and level heads on our shoulders. We are not people who have been wrapped up by the Generation X attitudes. We bring to this campus a fresh voice and a new wave of ideas. When elected we will not sit on our hands and bide time. At the least, we will shake things up and create situations that will improve the state of this University.

Presidential candidate
John Farrell, secondary education

Vice Presidential candidate
Mark Moessner, architectural engineering

1. What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

The need for stricter policies concerning who can and cannot run for student body president and vice president.

2. What could you do to enhance the quality of student life at K-State?

The immediate construction of 17 underground parking garages on campus is imperative. I feel terrible for all of the students who are forced to sit in their cars and wait for a space to open when they could just as easily park a few blocks away and walk.

3. In 50 words or fewer, describe what makes you more qualified for these positions than other candidates.

I have obtained keen verbal and bargaining skills by watching J.R. in action on reruns of the TV show "Dallas."

Otto

Knedlik

Aaron Otto and Amy Knedlik

Presidential candidate
Aaron Otto, political science and general management

Vice residential candidate
Amy Knedlik, accounting and finance

1. What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

We feel that providing course and instructor information so that students, with their advisers, can make better-educated decisions about what courses they want to enroll in. Tremendous progress has been made this year, and we want to continue this project to completion and get this useful information to the students.

2. What could you do to enhance the quality of student life at K-State?

We will work to ensure that students have the necessary quality teaching, technology and resources to get the most out of their education. We will also work to keep the costs of education reasonable and the campus environment safe.

3. In 50 words or fewer, describe what makes you more qualified for these positions than other candidates.

We have extensive experience in each branch of Student Governing Association and have demonstrated a continuous commitment to serving K-State students. We sincerely value student input and will provide all students with the opportunity to voice their opinions. Contact us at (aotto@ksu.edu) or (knedlik@ksu.edu). Rafferty

Colin Rafferty and Trey Hock

Presidential candidate
Colin Rafferty, English

Vice presidential candidate
Trey Hock, English

1. What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

Candidates can talk specifics, but what it comes down to is money. The level of student fees directly affects every student, and the most important issue facing us is a question: Do we want to pay more for better services, or pay less for mediocre services? We must choose wisely.

2. What could you do to the enhance the quality of student life at K-State?

Under a Rafferty-Hock administration, Student Governing Association will be more open to students, and it will be more fun. If nothing else, we promise to bring fun things to K-State for the students' enjoyment, whether it be giant ball pits during finals, or massive slides out of registration. We are pro-fun.

3. In 50 words or fewer, describe what makes you more qualified for these positions than other candidates.

We're outsiders to SGA. For too long, the same politicians have controlled SGA, using it to further résumés, rather than students. These career politicians do not represent the average student. We, as English majors who won't get jobs anyway, have nothing to lose, and everything to gain for the students.

Neufeld

Tim Riemann and Jennafer Neufeld

Presidential candidate
Tim Riemann, agricultural economics, pre-law and French

Vice presidential candidate
Jennafer Neufeld, agricultural economics

1. What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

Education: Are students getting the most out of their education dollars? A state-funded Pell grant could help with the cost of attending K-State. It also provides opportunities for more students to attend K-State. Students graduating in debt is the most important issue at K-State.

2. What could you do to enhance the quality of student life at K-State?

Enhance the educational opportunities for students. Our three issues are centered strictly around education for a reason. We believe that it can be better. We believe that a Student Advisory Committee on Teaching Excellence and a plus-system that encourages higher standards are positive challenges.

3. In 50 words or fewer, describe what makes you more qualified for these positions than other candidates.

Leadership with a Vision. Riemann and Neufeld are familiar with the combination of hard work and success. We are ready, willing and able to meet the demands of K-State students and faculty. It is time to look for the vision and the leadership that is provided for you.

1. What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

1. What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

We need to inform students of all of the many opportunities available at K-State. We also need to go a step further by showing students where they need to go to utilize these facilities. If students must spend this much money, they should have some idea where it is going.

2. What would you do to increase communication between the Senate and your constituents?

The College of Agriculture has publications, such as pick-ups, that keep students up to date on what is going on. We could possibly add a column on Student Governing Association affairs. There are many things that could be done to inform students.

I think money is the most important issue, and, more specifically, the cost of tuition. With the adoption of the linear-tuition system, I believe more students are feeling the strain on their checkbooks. Money, or lack thereof, affects every K-Stater every day, and I think it certainly needs to be considered how we can save students money.

1. What do you think is the most important issue facing UGB?

The Union renovation project is the greatest issue facing the K-State Student Union and K-State. As a student with experience with this issue, it is essential that the services of the Union are not lost to revenues of retails sales, which would undercut its student mission.

2. What would you do to increase communication between UGB and your constituents?

Open enhancement meetings and frequent visitations with students about the renovation will ensure their feedback in the process, as well as their understanding.

3. What makes you more qualified to represent UGB than your opponents?

I have served on the renovation committee and UGB for three years. My experience with this project ensures a strong voice in the Union.

1. What do you think is the most important issue facing UGB?

The upcoming renovations are the biggest issues for the K-State Student Union. They affect almost every aspect of Union operations from new food-service groups to the location of the art gallery.

2. What would you do to increase communication between UGB and your constituents?

I was recently nominated to UGB, and I've noticed that what we discuss appears in the Collegian, which reaches more students than I could alone.

3. What makes you more qualified to represent UGB than your opponents?

UGB numbers give the students' perspective. Anyone can do that, but I've also worked extensively with faculty and administration and know how to compromise.

1. What do you think is the most important issue facing UGB?

Education. That is what we pay thousands of dollars for. Union Governing Board must do its best to enhance the learning environment and the educational opportunities for students.

2. What would you do to increase communication between UGB and your constituents?

I would suggest surveys. Before changing anything significant in the K-State Student Union, those who use the Union should be surveyed about their interest in the change.

3. What makes you more qualified to represent UGB than your opponents?

I actively participate in numerous Union activities, including Union Program Council. I also rely on the Union as a place to study and relax.

1. What do you think is the most important issue facing UGB?

The expansion of the K-State Student Union and the problems it will create for the students who use it.

2. What would you do to increase communication between UGB and your constituents?

Through polls and questionnaires, we need to ask students what they feel would best help them in the expansion process.

3. What makes you more qualified to represent UGB than your opponents?

I have served on this board and helped to keep the Union art gallery in the Union. I feel I can be a strong voice of the students on this board.

1. What do you think is the most important issue facing the Board of Student Publications?

Education is the most important issue. When that is superseded by frivolous topics like parking, priorities are misplaced. Focus should be on supporting topics like Tevals and state funding.

2. What would you do to increase communication between the board and your constituents?

I'll be accessible to living groups and organizations for suggestions. Also, a survey would be helpful in measuring students' wants and needs for campus media.

3. What makes you more qualified to represent the board than your opponents?

My greatest qualifications are the following:
1. A good ear listening to students.
2. Graceful transitions of ideas into realities.
Both, in harmony, will benefit K-State.

1. What do you think is the most important issue facing the Board of Student Publications?

To me, the most important issue is the image of the Collegian to its constituency. If students lose faith in the Collegian's efforts, the image is tarnished. I would work toward improving any deficiencies that the Collegian faces or would face.

2. What would you do to increase communication between the board and your constituents?

I believe that Student Publications owes students a more meaningful policy. A policy founded on restraint, respect and tact has to exist.

3. What makes you more qualified to represent the board than your opponents?

I have run organizations that have millions for many years. I would bring all these experiences in managing the budget and Collegian policy.

The most important issue facing the Board of Student Publications is providing effective, high-quality publications while keeping student fees at a minimum.

2. What would you do to increase communication between the board and your constituents?

I will increase communication by providing information and seeking feedback on current issues through my homepage at (http://www-personal.ksu.edu/~geckert) and by visiting students and groups.

3. What makes you more qualified to represent the board than your opponents?

Both serving in student government leadership positions and majoring in journalism provide me with a unique perspective to bring to the board.

1. What do you think is the most important issue facing the Board of Student Publications?

Student fees and the cost of the education received at K-State is what I see as a real issue. Whether it is a state Pell grant or an increase in student fees for more parking, students are concerned with money they receive for college assistance and the money they spend for the education they get in return.

2. What would you do to increase communication between the board and your constituents?

The Board of Student Publications needs to inform the students of K-State where their money is going in regard to student publications. A more effective use of the Collegian and other media available would accomplish this.

3. What makes you more qualified to represent the board than your opponents?

My experience as a member of the Collegian and a student in the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communication can be beneficial when issues of student publications are of significant concern.

1. What do you think is the most important issue facing the Board of Student Publications?

A significant concern facing student publications is student satisfaction with its products. While certainly unusual in its diversity, many students believe the paper they fund should better reflect some of the opinions they hold. I believe the board should help encourage finding a middle ground while continuing to encourage continued quality.

2. What would you do to increase communication between the board and your constituents?

Students should take time to write and comment on publications. Board members need to continue efforts to gain a broad perspective and incorporate student opinions.

3. What makes you more qualified to represent the board than your opponents?

General business and Student Governing Association experience has given me the tools to be effective. I understand past members' commitment and stand ready to accept that responsibility.

1. What do you think is the most important issue facing the Board of Student Publications?

Many students are financing their own education through work and financial aid. It is important to recognize this by keeping costs down. There is a real challenge to use student fee money to provide the best services possible without increasing fees.

2. What would you do to increase communication between the board and your constituents?

I think that it is important that the names and e-mail addresses of members of student government who deal with fees be published and available.

3. What makes you more qualified to represent the board than your opponents?

I am very cost-conscious and will look for ways to provide high quality student publications without large increases in student fees.

I will be direct about issues affecting students, as well as encourage more student, faculty and alumni interaction to sustain a broad knowledge base.

House rejects local option for handguns

▶ What would this bill require from applicants?

- Be at least 21 years of age
- Have no felony convictions
- Not be chemically dependent
- Not be under a court order affecting the spousal relationship
- Be a legal resident of Kansas for six months.

▶ CONCEALED-CARRY BILL sent to final vote in House today.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The House tentatively approved a bill Monday that would allow licensed Kansans to carry concealed handguns.

The unrecorded voice vote, following a 2-1/2-hour debate, sent the bill to a final vote this morning.

The key vote came when the House rejected an amendment that would have allowed voters in each county to vote on the issue next year.

Among several amendments that were turned back was one offered by Rep. Bruce Larkin, D-Baileyville, that would have required a vote in each of the state's 105 counties at the 1998 general election.

Voters in a county would have had to approve the question for the concealed carry law to take effect in that county.

The vote against Larkin's amendment was 68-50.

Opponents of the bill believe the bill must have some kind of statewide referendum or local option provision before it has any chance of gaining Gov. Bill Graves' signature.

"Someone put a gun to my head," Rep. Steve Lloyd, R-Clay Center, quipped when asked why he was carrying the bill.

Rep. Gary Hayzlett, R-Lakin, the bill's chief sponsor, called it a very restrictive bill.

Supporters said letting law-abiding citizens who have undergone training and have a permit to carry a gun would deter crime. Opponents said having more people armed would not improve public safety, and could lead to more accidental shootings.

A similar bill is before the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee.

Kansas law generally allows individuals to carry concealed handguns only on their own property or at their own businesses. Thirty-one states allow the general public to carry concealed weapons if they meet licensing requirements.

A similar bill was passed by the House last year, but failed in the Senate. Supporters said they expected the measure to win House approval again, but its prospects in the Senate still are uncertain.

Clinton, FBI square off about Chinese money

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Clinton

WASHINGTON — The White House and the FBI clashed in a rare public quarrel Monday after President Clinton complained he should have been alerted about the agency's suspicions that the Chinese government might be trying to influence U.S. elections.

"The president should know," Clinton asserted.

However, the FBI said it placed no restriction whatsoever on information going up the chain of command when it told two officials at the White House National Security Council staff last June that China might make illegal contributions to congressional campaigns.

But the White House insisted that the two officials clearly recall being urged not to disseminate the information outside the briefing room.

"Therefore, the White House considers the FBI's statement to be in error," presidential spokesman Mike McCurry said, leaving the FBI and the White House at an awkward impasse at day's end.

The supposedly secret China briefing was the latest development in a series of White House embarrassments on the campaign fundraising front. Even though the allegations were of Chinese contributions aimed at congressional races, Clinton and senior aides suggested they might have been more careful about accepting foreign donations from Asian sources had they known about the alleged Chinese scheme.

The president said it would have provoked a red flag on his part.

The alleged withholding of information from Clinton seemed even stranger in the wake of revelations that the FBI gave classified briefings — to members of the NSC staff last year and to a member of Congress five years earlier — warning that China was trying to influence members of Congress with campaign contributions.

Before the FBI issued its statement, Clinton complained

FORSAKING THE WEST COAST, A FILM STUDENT RETURNS TO HIS ROOTS TO BEGIN FILMING A STORY DELVING INTO THE SANE AND INSANE. THIS DISREGARD COULD BEST BE CALLED

INDEPENDENT'S Day

STEVE BALDERSON, an independent filmmaker, is in the process of producing and directing "Pep Squad," his next film. Balderson is making his film independently for artistic expression.

STORY BY PORTIA SISCO • PHOTO BY IVAN KOZAR

Sitting at his kitchen table in his apartment above an antique store, Steve Balderson smoked Lucky Strikes and sipped red wine as he discussed his new movie.

Balderson will be filming his movie, titled "Pep Squad," in Manhattan.

"I've always known I wanted to do this. It was just the time for me to do this," Balderson said.

Balderson's film career includes an acting part in the movie "Crossing Guard."

He has also directed several movies he made in high school and when he was at college at the California Institute of Art.

Although Balderson lived in Los Angeles for almost four years, he chose to return to Manhattan to make his film.

"When I look out the window, I don't think I'm in Manhattan," Balderson said. "I grew up here. I find it almost fictional. It's beautiful."

Balderson wrote the screenplay, but his interests in the movie don't stop there.

"I am the producer and the director. I also wrote the script," Balderson said.

Balderson will cast supporting and minor roles from local talent.

Balderson said he is looking for people who will take it seriously, because it's something people in Japan will see.

"I'm looking for people that embody a style and an aesthetic I need for the picture," Balderson said.

Balderson said some of the calls he has received from people interested in parts were ridiculous.

"They're morons. Nimrods," Balderson said. "A lot of them weren't so much odd as people calling with no experience, just thinking it would be a fun thing to do, having no idea of the magnitude."

Residence hall fees to increase by $150 beginning fall 1997

SHAWN T. DENTON
staff reporter

Room and board rates for K-State residence halls will increase by $150 beginning in fall 1997.

The current cost for a bed in a double-occupancy residence hall room plus a 20-meal plan at K-State is $1,745 per semester. The increase will make the plan $1,820 per semester.

Robert Burgess, assistant director of housing and dining, said the rates are competitive with other options for students when they weigh in all of the factors.

"In previous years we have had cost studies that combine our room and board and compare it with the Manhattan market," Burgess said. "When you look at our cost, with inclusive room and board, food and preparation, utilities, then it becomes very competitive."

Burgess said that students benefit from the lack of additional expenses at residence halls.

"Additional expenses are never really thought about in housing," Burgess said. "You have avoided those."

The Department of Housing and Dining is an auxiliary enterprise, which means they get no funding from outside sources. Burgess said that roughly 95 percent of the departments funding comes from the rental rates.

There are four factors increasing room rates. They include food costs, labor, utilities and capital expenditures.

"Some of these we have no control over," Burgess said. "One reason rates went up this year was the minimum wage went up."

According to projected figures, K-State's prices will be the lowest in the Big 12 in rental rate expense, Chuck Werring, director of housing and dining, said.

Burgess said discussion with other colleagues across the country led him to believe that K-State is in the lower 20 percent of overall rates in the nation.

Students have different opinions about the rental rates of residence halls. Daphne Bond, freshman in pre-nursing and Moore Hall resident, said she does not eat as much as she pays for in residence halls.

"I think the rates are kind of high," Bond said. "We looked into an apartment and found we can pay less."

But David Molamphy, freshman in architectural engineering and Goodnow Hall resident, said it is convenient to live in the residence halls.

"I've talked to a lot of architecture majors, and they say it's an easier convenience to live here," Molamphy said. "Personally, I think it's a good deal, and you get your money's worth."

Molamphy said activities in the halls were another plus for students.

"It has some structure to create bonds," Molamphy said.

▶ How much will the residence hall expense be?

• NAZI GUARD SUSPECT DIES AT KU MEDICAL CENTER.

KANSAS CITY — A suspected Nazi death camp guard died late Sunday night at the University of Kansas Medical Center, where he had been since suffering gunshot wounds in a shootout with police.

Michael Kolnhofer, 79, who was placed on a respirator for five weeks after the New Year's Eve shootout, recently was reported to be recovering. He had improved and responded to simple verbal commands, such as squeezing a hand, Dr. Norman Estes, the hospital's chief of staff, had said.

Kolnhofer had suffered brain damage during surgery for bullet wounds. Hospital spokesman Van Buckley said Kolnhofer died at 11:15 p.m. Sunday. The hospital would release no further information.

• COMMISSION RECOMMENDS THAT CHIEF NOT BE GIVEN 2ND TERM.

LOS ANGELES — The city Police Commission recommended Monday that Police Chief Willie Williams not be given a second five-year term, citing his failure to be an effective leader.

The city needs a chief who can gain the respect of the public as well as the department's rank-and-file, Commission President Ray Fisher said.

Williams did not take steps to become a respected leader in the department, Fisher told a news conference.

• MALE CITADEL CADET DISMISSED IN HAZING INVESTIGATION.

CHARLESTON, S.C. — A male cadet at the Citadel has been dismissed, and nine others have been given various punishments in the hazing and harassment of two women cadets, school officials said Monday.

One cadet was cleared.

The discipline is the result of private hearings for the 11 cadets before school officials March 1. The results were not released until Monday.

The FBI and the State Law Enforcement Division also are investigating allegations that Jeanie Mentavlos of Charlotte, N.C., and Kim Messer of Clover were hazed and harassed.

The women did not return to the state military school for the spring semester. Two other women remain as cadets.

• ISRAELI TROOPS, PALESTINIANS CLASH MONDAY IN WEST BANK.

JERUSALEM — Israeli troops and Palestinians clashed on the West Bank Monday, and Yasser Arafat complained that Israel's plan to give him only a third of the land he expected had created a real crisis.

Arafat's top deputy threatened to resign over the dispute with Israel, and a top Israeli official said American intervention might be needed to resolve the impasse over the pullout, the first of three withdrawals Israel has promised to make by mid-1998.

• JUDGE TO HEAR DNA EVIDENCE IN SHEPPARD SLAYING CASE.

CLEVELAND — A judge will hear new DNA findings that defense lawyers say support Dr. Sam Sheppard's famous alibi that it was a bushy-haired intruder who beat his pregnant wife to death in 1954.

Cuyahoga Common Plea Judge Ron Suster scheduled a May 5 hearing on DNA evidence that could clear Sheppard's name in the killing and help his son collect money for the 10 years his father spent in prison.

Sheppard defense lawyers say recently completed DNA tests on blood taken from the crime scene strengthens their claim that Marilyn Sheppard was killed by an intruder.

Sheppard steadfastly denied that he killed his wife. He said a bushy-haired intruder killed her, then attacked him.

Sheppard, an osteopathic surgeon whose story inspired "The Fugitive," had his conviction overturned on appeal after serving a decade in prison and was acquitted in a second trial. He died in 1970.

Faculty to vote on class evaluations

BENHAMIN YODER
staff reporter

The days of asking people what a class or instructor was like might be coming to an end soon.

A course information proposal has been introduced to Faculty Senate. It will be voted on at Faculty Senate's April 8 meeting.

Student Body President Chris Hansen said a survey asking students about the instructor, textbook and time needed to prepare for a course will be administered in about 70 classes in December and will be available to students the next spring.

He said establishing the program would cost between $20,000 and $30,000, but he said he did not want students to bear the whole responsibility of financing the program.

"I'm hoping for a combination of student fees and University resources," he said

The program will allow students to read about class expectations, styles and grading procedures of general education courses instead of relying on word of mouth.

The proposal will only include information about lower-level general education classes.

It originally asked for analysis of all courses, but that part of the proposal was dropped.

Faculty Senate President David Balk said the information program did not need to include information on all classes because students must take higher-level courses within their program of study.

"They're required courses," he said. "It's illogical."

Balk said some faculty might object to the program because of privacy concerns, administration time and the content of the questions, but he said he did not think that to be a problem.

"I don't find it intrusive," he said. "I think on the whole, it's a reasonable set of questions."

Balk said he was in favor of the proposal because it increased the amount of information available to students choosing what classes to take.

"It would enrich education," he said. "I do hope it gets majority support."

Hansen said the choices students make when deciding what classes to take were more important than ever because of linear tuition.

"This is a tool that students and advisers can use to make informed decisions," he said. "We need to make good decisions."

Aaron Otto, student body vice president, said the program would allow students and advisers to see a comprehensive analysis of courses when deciding about classes.

"Students simply don't have enough information," Otto said.

"This will educate both the student and the adviser."

Otto said he thought some faculty members would object, but he said gathering information for students was the focus of program.

"We're not trying to label a teacher good or bad," he said.

Otto said the information will be published in course catalogs and on the World Wide Web.

He said the cost would be greatly reduced because of publication on the Web and would increase the accessibility of the information.

The survey will be administered at the same time as teacher evaluations but will be analyzed separately by an outside source.

Balk said the project needed to be administered the same way campuswide.

"I would prefer that it would be a uniform procedure," he said.

"It's going to be a massive undertaking."

Volunteers work front line for museum

SANDY DAVIS

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art's Docent Program brings together a group of volunteers that gives museum tours, teaches through outreach programs and acts as host at special events.

"The first group I toured had some older people that had gone to school with John Helm. He was the first curator of the University's art collection," Cynthia Dowdy, docent at the Beach Art Museum, said. "They knew as much, if not more, about the art than I did."

Anyone who loves art or teaching and has the desire to help at the museum can be a docent. Volunteers don't have to know anything about art to join the program.

"I had never had an art history class before this," said Dowdy, counselor at Manhattan Area Technical College. "I've learned a lot."

"They are basically our front line," Kathrine Walker, education coordinator at the Beach Museum, said.

Walker said the program is a great opportunity for students interested in museum work, art or education.

Mary Hemphill, one of the 20 members of the Beach Museum's docent program and an elementary school art teacher, said training is a continuing process. The process started for her with a year's worth of classes that discussed learning styles, methods of discussing art and art history.

The Beach Museum docents also went on docent-guided tours at the Sheldon Memorial Art Gallery at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, and the Spencer Museum of Art at the University of Kansas.

Each Beach docent put together a highlights tour of the museum's permanent collection centered around a theme with a clearly-stated objective.

"The point of a highlights tour is not to look at every piece of art in the museum," Hemphill said.

Hemphill said that on her first tour, the group wanted to stop and look at every piece and ask her questions about all of them.

"I thought, 'This isn't the way it's supposed to go,'" Hemphill said. "It was more like I followed them around and answered all their questions."

A highlights tour consists of six or seven pieces the docent can focus on and discuss with the people. There are also museum games for children's tours.

"We try to have an interactive experience rather than a lecture," Hemphill said.

Docents are also available to give outreach programs to people who are unable to visit the museum, such as schools or nursing homes. The presentations consist of slides of art pieces and educational activities, as well as worksheets that promote discussion of the art.

Docents are asked to give a two-year commitment to the program, but exceptions can be made for students who will be graduating before the two year period is up. Docents should plan to work three to four times a month and attend monthly meetings and all training sessions for new exhibits.

"It's really delightful to see their excitement when they learn something about the art," Dowdy said. "I would encourage anyone to get into docent work."

Informational meetings for a new class of Museum docents will be at 10 a.m. and 6:30 p.m. Tuesday in the Museum's Activities Room. Prior background in art or art history is not required. Prospective docents will participate in a two-semester training course. Semester I will be in April and May and cover aesthetics and art history. Semester II will be September-November and cover learning styles and touring techniques. For more information, call Kathrine Walker, Education Coordinator, at 532-7718.

Professor retires after almost 50 years

After nearly half a century on K-State's playing field, Ken Gowdy, associate dean of engineering, will retire his academic jersey in mid-June.

Recruited to play Big 7 football for Kansas State College as an undergraduate in 1950, Gowdy said his days as a student athlete helped him fuse teamwork and a winning attitude into his roles as a teacher and administrator.

"I'm not sure students today understand what an opportunity it was to attend college in those days. It was fairly unusual. Most of us came from families who didn't go to college," Gowdy said.

KEN GOWDY, associate dean of engineering, plans to retire in June. Gowdy started his time at K-State in 1950, when he was recruited to play Big 7 football for Kansas State College.

While class president in 1954, Gowdy finished his final year of football with a 6-3-1 season. He transferred from business to engineering at the end of his freshman year and accumulated 160 hours before graduating in 1955. He was also in the Sigma Chi fraternity.

"It was the thrill of attending college compiled with the opportunity to play Big 7 football. Sports had a lot to offer whether you win or lose. Sometimes the opportunity and will to play makes you a winner," he said.

While serving two years in the Air Force, Gowdy, an ROTC graduate, returned to Manhattan for a basketball game against Iowa State. A chance meeting with Dean M. A. Durland's daughter during halftime resulted in Gowdy returning to K-State as a part-time instructor and assistant dean while pursuing his master's degree.

"When you get to this age, you start to wonder how your life takes certain turns and as close as I can tell, it all came down to attending that basketball game," Gowdy said.

"I went to see Dean Durland after the game and he asked me what I was doing and what I planned to do. Six weeks later, a letter came offering me a job."

Gowdy said he's seen the College of Engineering expand and improve greatly under the leadership of Dean Donald Rathbone.

"He has added a lot to this University, which is now a major research institution with the breadth one expects of a research institution. There are very strong programs in all of the colleges," Gowdy said.

He earned his doctorate at Oklahoma State. After a five-year stint as head of the engineering technology department at Texas A&M, Gowdy returned to work with K-State students.

In recent years, Gowdy has taught four to six hours each semester, including career development, thermodynamics and engineering concepts.

"The students are the best of what I'm going to miss. It's gratifying to work with people in that phase of life and open their eyes and help prepare them for what lies ahead," Gowdy said. "I don't think I'm unique because that's why most people are here. Gowdy said he'll miss the daily opportunity for interaction in the dean's office but likes discussing personal values and ethics with students in his honors colloquium best.

"We are not trying to impose any set of values on them. But we encourage them to think through the set of values that they hold and identify a set of principles that will sustain them throughout their life," Gowdy said.

"Young people in the age bracket of 18-22 are just tremendous to be around. They have so much energy and potential, and to be able to do that for 40 years makes you a blessed individual."

Gowdy's principles are based on strong belief in God. His early morning prayer and reading scriptures evolved into writing poetry. In 1994, he published two collections of poetry called "The Beauty of God" and "The Wondrous Works of God."

Besides reading books on history, cosmology and theology, Gowdy said he also plans to experiment in nature photography during retirement.

Gowdy will celebrate his 45th wedding anniversary this summer with a commemorative trip to Victoria, British Columbia.

He and his wife, Dolores, have four children and 10 grandchildren.

Hold these candidates accountable; don't vote for campaign violators

People who can't turn things in on time should not be trusted with Student Governing Association.

SGA's Election Committee ruled that two pairs of presidential candidates and 15 other SGA candidates violated election rules. Most of these candidates broke the rules by failing to turn in expenditure reports or turning them in late.

These candidates do not deserve the privilege of representing the student body because they cannot handle the responsibility.

The Election Committee excluded some of the people who cannot handle the responsibility ct the beginning of the campaign. It did not put people on the ballot if they failed to attend one of the mandatory meetings. This is a step in the right direction for SGA elections.

Now it is in the voters' hands. Students should not vote for candidates who cannot understand or respect the rules. Candidates must be able to understand procedures to do the students any good.

If these people acted this way when applying for a job, they wouldn't get hired. Voters should treat them the same way.

But if these candidates win positions in SGA, it will be back in Student Senate's hands. If they are elected, they will need approval from a two-thirds majority of this year's Senate to take their seats.

This year's Senate should continue what it started. It should refuse to approve these seats like it refused to let people run if they didn't attend a mandatory meeting. Then the election guidelines would have teeth.

For more information about the candidates, check out the Voters' Guide that was in Monday's Collegian. Because of space constraints, College Council candidates did not appear in the printed version. They are covered in the Electronic Collegian at (http://collegian.ksu. edu/issues/v101/sp/info/elections).

•TODD STEWART'S COMMENTS ABOUT WOMEN'S BASKETBALL UNNECESSARY

Editor,

First, I agree with about 85 percent of the column on the men's basketball team, but now you've done it! Todd Stewart, you should have been in the same cell as Pee-Wee Herman if you go to the women's games to watch the pretty women and claim to love them.

You're right, Stewart, there is nothing at all sexist about commenting on how attractive a woman is, but this is not a beauty pageant — stick to sports!

Yes, someone does care about the women's basketball team for much more than perverted reasons. Head coach Deb Patterson is the greatest coach alive, and I know the potential the team has (a true sports fan)!

As far as the women's program progressing to the same level as the men's, the last time I looked, the men's team is finished — the women's isn't! I would like Stewart to know: not only are you the "most stubborn man in the world," you're an idiot sports columnist!

Editor,

Todd Stewart is an embarrassment to K-State and the field of journalism. As a regular reader of the Electronic Collegian, I found his latest column on the looks of the K-State women's basketball team to be totally unacceptable. The editor of the Collegian, along with Stewart, should be removed from their positions.

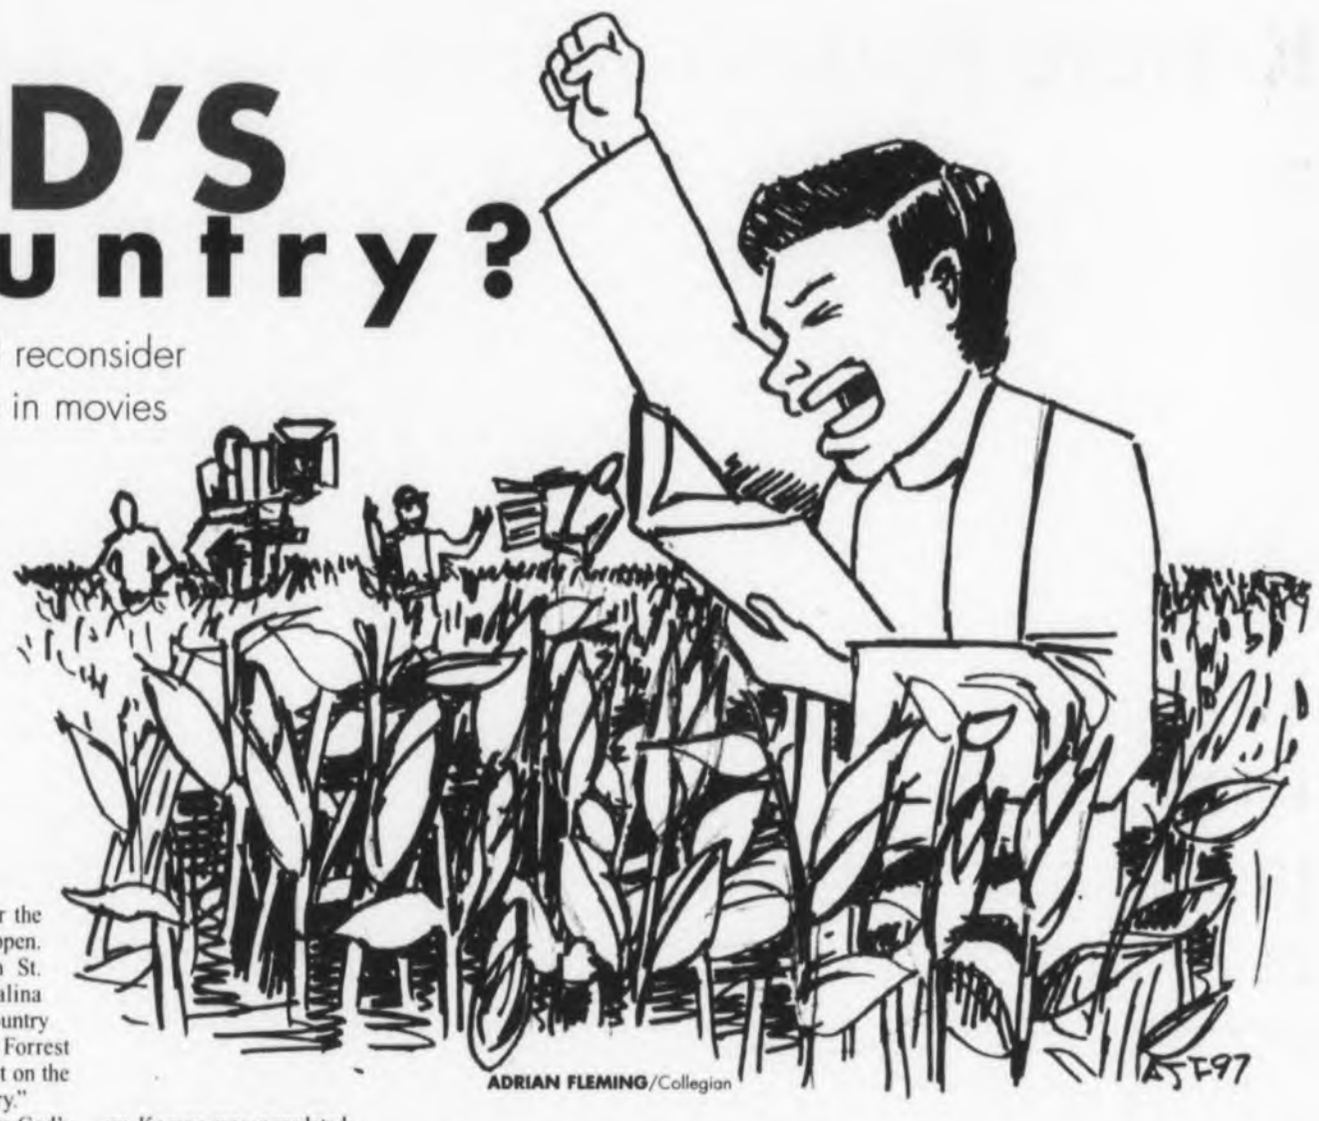
Brian Keener
Kanopolis, Kan.

Editor,

The main question that has surfaced this semester is simple. Who should be allowed to beat Todd Stewart first? I think Manny Dies should be allowed to play Stewart a little game of one-on-one, and after that, he should be allowed to beat him half to death.

We'll have to instruct Dies to leave enough life in Stewart for the women's basketball team. First, he claims no one cares about women's basketball. Next, he goes to a game and comes back with a report about how beautiful they are. Sexist? I think so.

After Dies is done with him, the women could take turns beating him in basketball and then just beating him. I wonder how beautifulhe would think they are after that.



Stewart seems to be writing simply to see how much controversy he can stir up. How boring. I paid little attention to it until his sexist remarks of Monday came down the pipe. Let's have the above-mentioned contests at Bramlage Coliseum and sell tickets.

We could donate the money to Stewart's medical bills.

After Bob Dole's failed bid for the presidency, it was bound to happen. Last Wednesday the cadets from St. John's Military Academy in Salina greeted TV viewers across the country on "Good Morning America." Forrest Sawyer, serving as a substitute host on the show, called Kansas "God's Country."

We know already that we live in God's country.

But even if we accept this as the compliment it was meant to be and ignore the unsavory implications, such as our being ruled by religious fundamentalists, do we really wish to have the character and diversity of Kansas so tidily summed up in two words?

East and West Coast media describe the inhabitants of states between the 94th and 103rd meridians in oversimple, patronizing terms that absolve themselves from the need to consider the many different cultures that exist there.

Texas is the place where everything is bigger than normal.

The Dakotas are still home to hostile Sioux. Oklahoma is a cowpuncher's paradise.

Nebraska is the land of tall cornstalks.

Kansas is the natural domicile of the God-fearing, conservative, Methodist wheat farmer.

Look at the damage this has done to our prestige in the movie theaters.

If you saw "Planes, Trains, and Automobiles," and lived in some other part of the country, you might think southeast ern Kansas was populated mostly by hotel managers who never provide enough towels or by men who spit out tobacco juice very obviously and insist that their wives ride in the cargo boxes of their pickup trucks.

"Leap of Faith" is even worse — crowd after crowd of farmers giving their scarce and hard-earned money to an itinerant preacher who comes in with a big tent and silver-sequined suit promising rain.

In that movie, the only favorable portrait of a native Kansan, and the only one true to real life, is the town sheriff, played by Liam Neeson, who interrupts one of the preacher's sermons to recite his criminal record to the audience.

The film ends happily, but only because we natives are lucky fools.

Even the recent film production of "In Cold Blood," aired on CBS as part of Hallmark's Hall of Fame series, still portrays western Kansans as narrow-minded, prejudiced, Methodist bumpkins.

It is a small enough consolation that it is at least based on actual events and the actors got the western Kansas twang down right.

While plenty of rednecks and bigots can be found in Kansas, they don't even begin to define the dramatic possibilities this state offers and which Hollywood has steadfastly ignored.

We have hustlers of our own, although they play fast and loose with farm subsidies instead of boxers' careers: Who needs Don King when we have Dean Gigot?

Filmmakers who wish to explore the workings of psychopathic minds could begin with William Quantrill and his raid on Lawrence.

Johnson County actually provides a better setting than the L.A. suburbs in which to explore the destruction of community feeling that paradoxically results from easy access to freeways built to more closely unify metropolitan areas.

Kansas City metro has half as many miles of controlled-access road per capita as any other American city.

A movie producer could begin with the fortress mentality that prevails within this county as its residents try to benefit from the financial and cultural benefits of Kansas City (such as downtown jobs, museums, the jazz district, etc.) while keeping its problems on the other side of the state line.

So far it is the only urban district in Kansas, which has readily given developers permission to build controversial, gated communities.

Black filmmakers could consider filming the founding of Nicodemus, a small town in Graham County founded shortly after the Civil War by freed slaves and is the site of the first school district in the area.

The result would not necessarily be as shot through with pure action as "Rosewood," but could, in its own way, be exciting.

It might in fact be prudent not to make any of these films and so conceal those things that make Kansas an interesting place to live in and visit.

Certainly this would prevent us from gaining the same kind of notoriety as California and New York, thus keeping our high standard of living safe from out-of-state parasites.

But simple self-respect demands that we at least try to pull the culture imperialists' boots out of our faces.

If you saw 'Planes, Trains and Automobiles,' and lived in some other part of the country, you might think that southeastern Kansas was populated mostly by motel managers who never provide enough towels or by men who spit out tobacco juice very obviously and insist their wives ride in the cargo boxes of their pickup trucks.

Does anyone need a short, fat, gun-shy and crippled black Lab named Cherokee? Oh, by the way, she's great with people, but when she is exposed to other dogs, she has a tendency to try ripping out their throats.

Last week, she attacked one of her fellow family members again. The eldest of our dogs, Cujo, nearly got to see his tongue lying on the pavement. Does anyone else see the irony here? The dog named Cujo got maimed.

The maimings have become so frequent that my parents have had to strap a muzzle on Cherokee when she is alone with the other dogs.

Cujo has been spending his time recuperating in the garage. He usually tears into the trash and scatters it all over the place. It drives my mother crazy. Although he isn't doing any of that now, Mom says he can't even swallow.

From what she says after 15 years, that's 105 in doggie years, the old guy is dying.

I had all this information relayed to me last week when I made an innocent phone call to ask about some financial-aid forms. By all appearances, my parents are contemplating putting Cherokee to sleep.

I know it sounds cold and ruthless, but I'm not really too concerned about Cherokee meeting her demise in some veterinarian's office. It's Cujo that has garnered my concern.

My family has always had lots of dogs. Growing up we had as many as four at a time. I'm not talking about poodles, either. I'm talking about big dogs.

Cujo is the last remaining dog from my childhood. My beautiful red Doberman was scattered all over our street when a car broadsided her one morning. I was 14 at the time. That left Cujo.

Cujo is a German shorthair runt. If he were human, he'd be Danny DeVito. My dad brought him home when I was 8 or 9 years old. From the day we got him, he had an affinity for chewing rocks. The dog is a little weirdo.

Cujo is a German shorthair runt. If he were human, he'd be Danny DeVito. My dad brought him home when I was 8 or 9. From the day we got him, he had an affinity for chewing rocks. The dog is a little weirdo.

Since he was a hunting dog, it was assumed that Cujo was going to spend most of his time in the pen. Cujo never accepted that.

The first pen my dad built for him was five feet tall, chain linked and roughly 10 feet by 10 feet. While he was building it, Cujo sat there chewing a piece of gravel and wagging his stub tail. I think he was laughing at the pen. He knew the little prison was destined for him, but he didn't care.

The first day we put him in his new home, he broke out of it as easily as a convict would break out of a pre-school.

Over the course of 15 years, my dad constructed pen after pen. In due course, Cujo escaped from each one.

Like Houdini, the dog is the master of escape.

To keep him caged, my dad finally built a pen that is paved (no more tunneling), 12 feet tall (no more jumping), and has a lock on the latch so Cujo can't release it. It comes equipped with armed guards manning a 50 feet tower.

Not only can the dog break free from 99 percent of the pens on the planet, he hunts like Michael Jordan plays basketball. Cujo could smell a quail in an onion field. When he was young and his legs were still spry, Cujo gave us dirty looks if we quit hunting before the sun set.

Even in his old age the dog is a much better hunter than I'll ever be. Two seasons ago when we were walking up a draw towards the road he snapped into point without any warning. His nose hadn't even been on the ground. The pheasant bolted for the sky two feet from me and my friend. We both took aim and fired all of our shells.

We didn't hit anything but Kansas sky. Cujo turned and looked back at us as if he was laughing at our futile attempt.

Now when we go hunting, Cujo's heart is still in it, but his body won't allow him to finish the day.

Around noon he just walks back to the truck and sits on the dirt road waiting for us to finish.

I figure he's old, and he has earned the right to relax in the twilight of his life.

When Cujo dies, it will be official. The last shred of my boyhood will have evaporated with time.

Life has become a series of births and deaths. When your family members start to die, it becomes difficult to enjoy the passing of time.

K-State finishes indoor season boasting 6 all-Americans

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

The K-State track and field team finished its indoor season this weekend when seven athletes competed at the NCAA Indoor Championships in Indianapolis.

The women's finish of 11th was the highest finish for the Wildcats since 1986. Altogether, six K-State athletes received all-America status, again the most since 1986.

"All of them performed better than they had preformed at any other championship meet before," Coach Cliff Rovelto said. "Any way you want to measure it, they all excelled."

Rovelto said he went into the competition just hoping the team would perform well.

"To be totally honest, I think we're pretty good, and I give us a lot of credit," Rovelto said. "In my recollection, I don't think we've ever had that many all-Americas in one year."

High jumper Wanita Dykstra earned the highest finish of any K-Stater, taking second with a jump of 6'2".

Vanitta Kinard broke a K-State record and earned all-America status in the triple jump with a leap of 44'3-1/4". Kinard's jump was also a personal record and one that nabbed her the third-place finish, but Kinard was not satisfied with her efforts.

"I could have won if I was stronger," Kinard said. "I went to the weight room, but I wasn't consistent, and I know I could have done better if I would have done that."

Kinard said her second time at the national competition was a good experience for all who attended.

"We all focused on what we had to do," she said. "Everyone that went was really determined in their events, and our expectations were high."

Renetta Seiler, who also was named an all-American in the weight throw and finished fifth in the event, avowed Kinard's statement.

"It was more intense last weekend than I have ever seen," Selier said. "Everyone knew that we had to do well, and it all just came together."

Kinard, Seiler, Dykstra and sprinter Karissa Stewart competed at the national meet last year where each gained experience for the championships last weekend.

"Last year everyone was a little shaky and at first everyone was in awe of the arena," Seiler said. "But this year we were more calm and we all had that meet last weekend where

Women's tennis team picks up win at Iowa State

SHANE McCORMICK
sports writer

The K-State women's tennis team picked up its first conference win of the season against Iowa State and Missouri, improving its record to 7-2.

The Wildcats first win didn't come easy Saturday, but they beat Iowa State in Ames, 5-4.

Starting off the dual strong, the Cats picked up wins at the No. 1 and No. 2 singles spots.

At No. 1, Yana Dorodnova cruised in the first set, winning 6-2. In the second, she struggled, falling into a tie-breaker. Dorodnova regained her first-set form, taking the set and the match over Erika Asmuss.

"The biggest thing is being able to make adjustments immediately," Coach Steve Bietau said. "I felt like that is what Yana was able to do in the second set. She has both the physical and mental capabilities to do that."

Lena Piliptchak and Karen Nicholson picked up the other Cat victories at the singles position.

Piliptchak cruised to a 6-2, 7-5 win over Kendra Leese. Nicholson served up a 6-1, 6-0 win over Mary Rumbasa.

Iowa State came on strong in the final two singles matches to even up the team score 3-3.

At the No. 5 spot, Chris Schulte lost in a tough three-set match, 4-6, 6-3, 4-6 to Angie Miller.

Freshman Aisha Butt lost to Maggi Agustsson at No. 6, 6-3, 6-3.

"We weren't playing as well as we would have liked, and I think they sensed a real opportunity for a win," Bietau said. "They just started to lift their level of play."

After Dorodnova and Piliptchak posted an 8-3 win at No. 1 doubles, Nicholson and Schulte were set to play the deciding match at No. 2 doubles.

The Cat duo started off slowly, trailing 2-5 in the eight-game pro-set. Nicholson and Schulte fought back to take the doubles match 8-5 and clinch the dual victory.

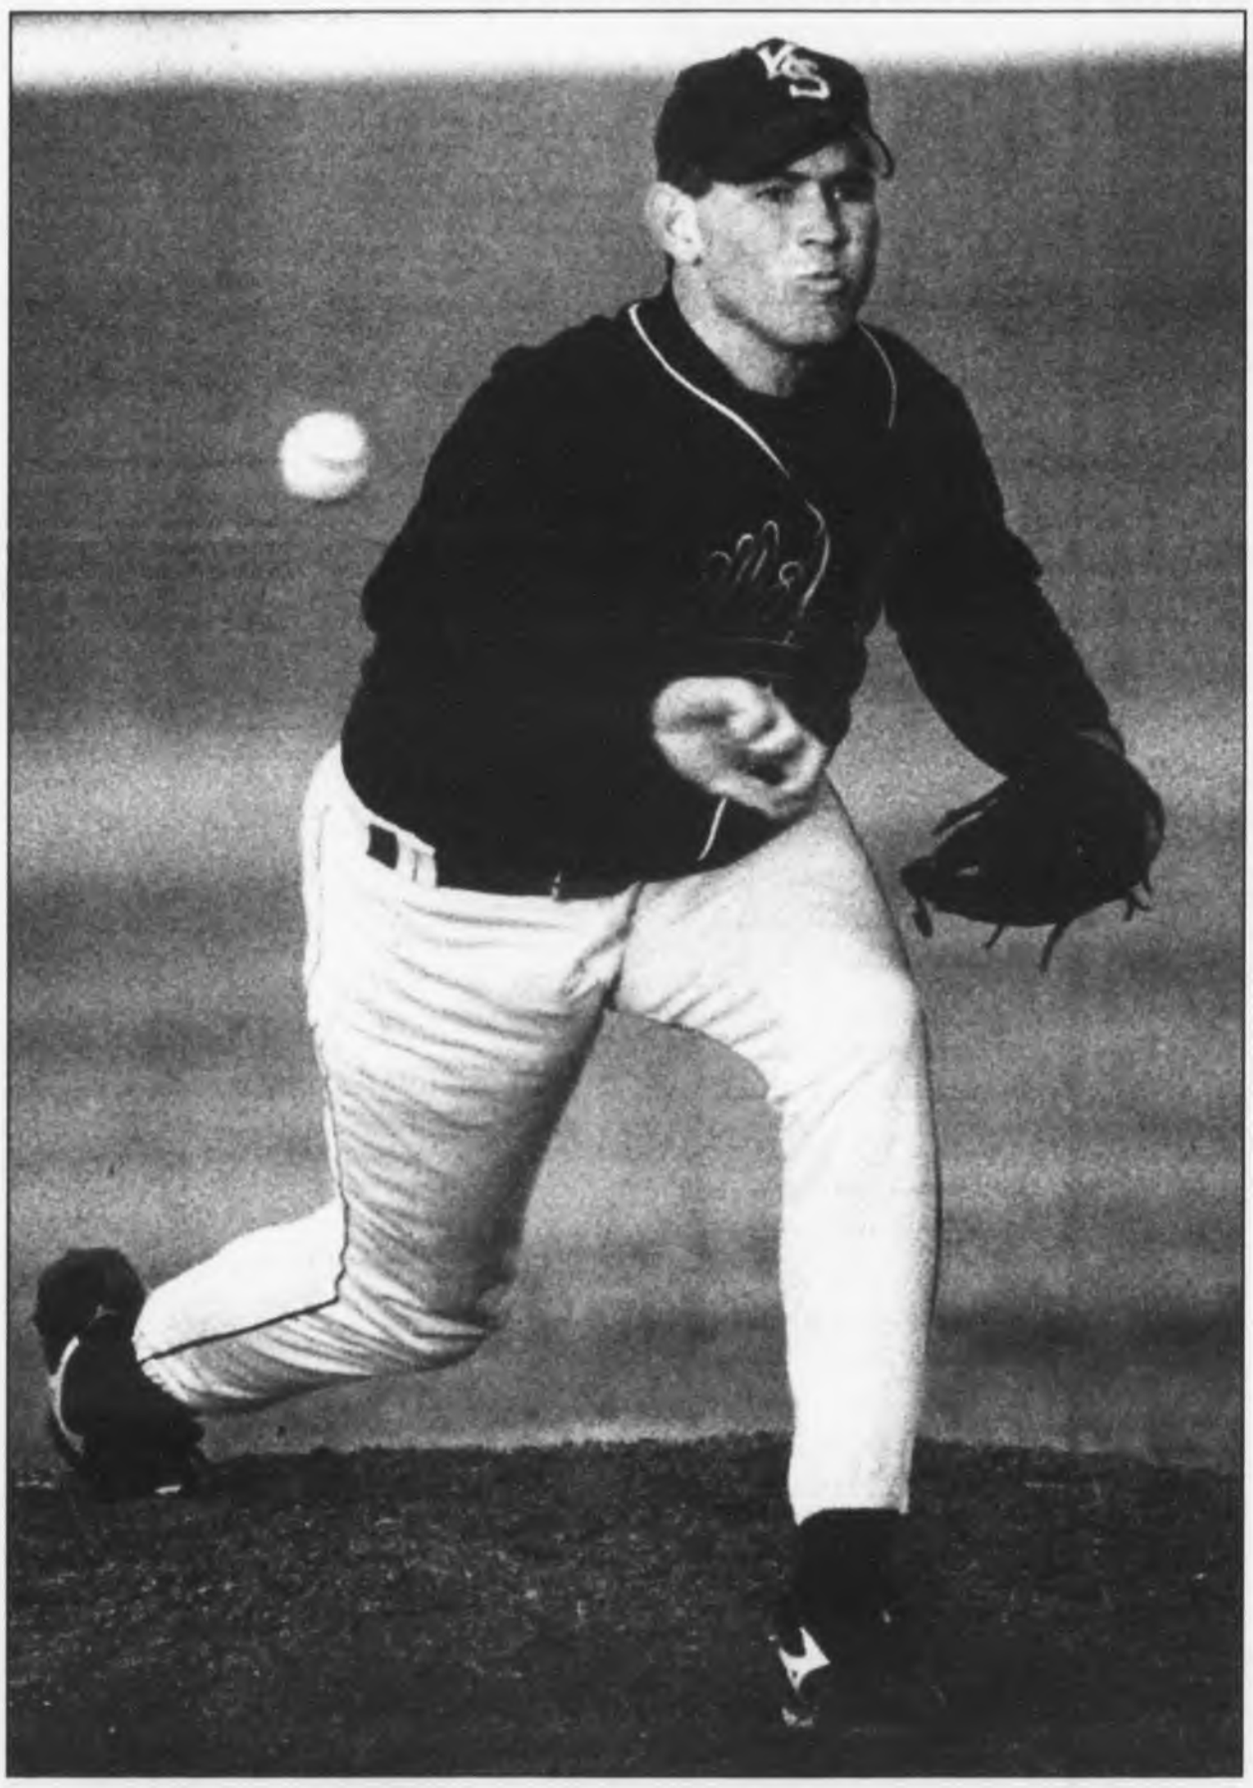
"When they turned things around after being down 2-5, they turned around the whole match," Bietau said. "They showed they were good enough to be able to switch the momentum."

After the victory over the Cyclones, the Cats traveled to Missouri, where they posted a 9-0 win over the Tigers.

In singles competition, the most games any Tiger was able to get off the Cat players was two.

Dorodnova and Piliptchak continued their successful spring campaign with a 8-2 victory over Andra Clemons and Molly Sigourney at No. 1 doubles.

Nicholson and Schulte cruised to an 8-1 win over Alyson Healy and Joni Jordan.



After a close match against the Cyclones, Bietau said he was looking for a different attitude from the Cats.

"I was really looking for them to be more ready than they were the day before," he said. "Against ISU, they were not ready and we discussed that. I wanted to see how they would respond, how they looked, if they were more together. Under those circumstances, the answer was definitely yes."

At 1 p.m. today, the K-State baseball squad will try to accomplish a feat ever elusive to the football team — beat the Nebraska Cornhuskers.

A Wildcat victory isn't outside the realms of reality, as both teams are at the bottom of the Big 12. K-State sits at 8-6 overall, but is 1-6 in Big 12 play. The Huskers venture into today's contests at 5-11 and 0-6 in the conference.

"They're very competitive," Coach Mike Clark said. "They swing the bats well. Their pitching is strong as well."

Nebraska leads the all-time series 128-81, taking three out of four games against the Cats last year, including a 5-2 and a 13-6 bruising in Manhattan.

The Huskers come into Cat country battered from an obliteration at the hands of the Baylor Bears, 7-6, 13-4 and 12-3.

Despite their performance this season, Clark doesn't take the Huskers for granted.

"We'll have to play at a good level," he said. "We have to play better this year."

The Huskers are led by junior first baseman and all-America candidate Todd Sears and by senior outfielder Francis Collins. Pete Driscoll, Steve Fish and Jonas Armenta headline the pitching rotation.

"Todd is a great player," Clark said. "Driscoll and Fish are tremendous."

Eric Yanz and Jason Wells are the listed starters for the Cats, but Clark was undecided on who would get the call for the first game.

Clark also delivered some positive notes from the Oklahoma State series this past weekend.

"We came close to taking two out of three," he said, "but that just doesn't happen there. I think they lost two games the entire year last season at home."

K-State was pummeled in the first game 23-12 on Friday.

"The wind was blowing out," Clark said. "That combined with a small ballpark, and they lit it up."

The second game saw the Cats come close but pull up short, 11-8. A late-inning rally by K-State failed after a bad break on a line drive, turning a possible extra base hit into a double play to end the inning.

The Cats snared the last game of the series on Sunday, 7-5, coming from behind for their first Big 12 victory.

"Jon Oiseth pitched great. He had a solid outing," Clark said. "He gave us a chance to come back."

David Johnson pitched the ninth for his sixth save of the season, tying the all-time single-season record, which he set last year.

"He was awesome," Clark said.

Although the games today are between two conference opponents, it is listed as a non-conference match-up because there are a certain number of conference games each school plays.

The Cats and Huskers scheduled their conference games for April 4-6 in Lincoln, Neb.

After tangling with the Cornhuskers, the Cats travel to Tulsa, Okla., this weekend to take part in the Oral Roberts Tournament, which includes the host team, Michigan and Pepperdine.

K-STATE'S Bret Payne hurls a pitch toward home during K-State's match-up against the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee last week. The Wildcats play a doubleheader with the Nebraska Cornhuskers today.

NCAA Tournament sure to reveal early round upsets in weeks to come

If you are one of the many who like to participate in your own version of March Madness, please read this column carefully. If you would like to take home the big jackpot of your NCAA pool, then you better read this, because your opponents will.

Yes, it is that time again, a special time when there is basketball on the television instead of soap operas. A special time when you will scream and cheer for teams you might not know anything about.

It's time to look into the crystal ball for those big upsets and solid picks in this year's tournament.

Let's first take a look at the East Region.

There are two upset specials in this region. First, look for No. 12 Princeton to upset No. 5 California. Princeton has always been tough in the tournament. Plus, they are a team that plays fundamental basketball, which will take you a long way. Just ask the K-State women's team.

The second upset special is No. 14 Old Dominion over No. 3 New Mexico. Yes, New Mexico has posted a solid 24-7 record, but look where they have been playing. They have been playing in the WAC Conference, which is not a solid basketball conference from top to bottom. Old Dominion has played solid, consistent basketball this season.

Look for North Carolina and South Carolina to meet in the finals of this region. UNC has really played great ball down the stretch, but South Carolina will be too much. Any team that beats Kentucky the way South Carolina did is a solid pick for the Final Four.

In the Southeast regional, I don't foresee any big upsets. Some will look for No. 12 College of Charleston to upset No. 5 Maryland. I don't see it happening. Teams are now aware of the College of Charleston. Maryland is a solid ACC team that will not overlook this game.

Kansas easily advances to the Final Four from this region.

In the Midwest Regional, don't look for the No. 1 seed Minnesota to make it too far. The Gophers are highly overrated and will probably fall to the winner of Mississippi and Temple in the second round.

If you are looking for a big upset, take a look at No. 7 Xavier upsetting No. 2 UCLA in the second round. Xavier beat a solid Cincinnati team earlier in the season and finished 22-5 in the Atlantic 10.

Look for No. 3 Cincinnati to make it to the Final Four out of this region.

Finally, let's turn our attention to the West regional.

When looking at this region, a couple things catch my attention:

No. 1 — Who in the world bribed the NCAA Selection Committee enough to get St. Joseph's a fourth seed?

No. 2 — What was the committee smoking when they made Utah a No. 5 seed behind St. Joseph's?

Utah has been a top-five team this season, a team with one of the premier players in the country, Keith Van Horn. St. Joseph's is ... well, St. Joseph's.

The only minor upset I see in this region will be Victor Page and No. 10 Georgetown over No. 7 North Carolina-Charlotte.

Everyone is counting Rick Pitino's Wildcats as the favorites in this region. I look for Tim Duncan to outplay Ron Mercer and the Wildcats, boosting Wake Forest into the Final Four.

So, the Final Four will feature South Carolina, Kansas, Cincinnati and Wake Forest.

Wake Forest will win easily over Cincinnati. The South Carolina-Kansas match will be the best of the tournament. For Kansas to win, they will have to hit the perimeter shots. With teams focusing on the Jayhawks' post play, the three-point shot will be open for the Jayhawks.

They weren't able to hit them last year against Syracuse, and they won't hit them this year when it counts. South Carolina will beat the Hawks in overtime and will go on to beat Wake Forest in the finals.

Final curtain opera closes director's career

STORY BY BECKY WINTER • PHOTO BY JILL JARSULIC

Jerry Langenkamp, professor of music, will close the curtain to 27 years of service to the K-State campus directing the operetta, "Die Fledermaus."

This marks the 20th and final KSU Opera Theatre production under his direction.

The comic operetta tells the story of a husband and wife along with several others who get mixed up in flirtations at a masked ball and then turn up for further revelry in jail.

"It's almost impossible to be bored at 'Die Fledermaus,'" Langenkamp said.

"We have a habit of thinking of opera as such an exalted art form. Everyone feels almost obligated to go home and have a seminar, but operas are meant to be enjoyed. It's as great an entertainment as Shakespeare or anything else," he said.

Tim Bonnell, sophomore in vocal performance, will play Gabriel Von Eisenstein in the operetta. He said he agrees it will be entertaining for the audience.

"It's like going to a comedy movie. There will be a lot of laughs for all ages," he said.

Charlotte MacFarland, associate professor of speech, has worked with Langenkamp on several operas and said she thinks Langenkamp is responsible for the success of the opera program at K-State.

"He has single-handedly made K-State's opera program unique. We are one of the few programs who works with the theater and music departments. I think a lot of that has to do with the fact that Jerry is this warm and kind person who is willing to work with anyone," she said.

Kelli Berry, senior in vocal performance, will play Adele in the operetta. She said she agrees that Langenkamp is an extraordinary person.

Review Theater

"He has been instrumental not only in my musical life, but in my personal life as well," she said. "He's one of those professors that can see the potential of a student even before they can, and he reaches down inside of them and pulls it out."

Langenkamp has been called on to play a more active part when a performer got sick.

"We had to have this actor walk through his part as I sang it from backstage. There were a number of people who said that they didn't even notice he wasn't singing," Langenkamp said.

Langenkamp said he also remembers Gerald Reeck, professor of biochemistry, stepping in at the last minute to play the part of a priest in another opera.

"He didn't really think he was going to have to go through with it, but we gave him a scroll like a priest would have, and he read the music right off it for all three productions," he said. "I guess if you do this for 27 years, you see just about everything."

"Die Fledermaus" will run Thursday-Saturday. Tickets can be purchased at the McCain Box Office from noon to 5 p.m. weekdays or by calling 532-6428 during box office hours. Ticket prices are $8 for students and $11 for the general public.

Publication board changes by-laws

TANYA NISLY
staff reporter

Members of the Board of Student Publications voted unanimously to make the director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications its chairperson again.

As a result, the new student members of the board, who will be elected this week, will not be able to seek this role, which has been a student-held position for two years.

Russell Fortmeyer, the board member from the Collegian, proposed the amendment to the by-laws.

"The chair of the board for nearly 50 years has always been the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism director, and I think it gives the board more credibility," Fortmeyer said. "It brings the board into tune with the journalism community, both national and international, that the board needs and a student cannot provide.

"But I suppose my main concern was consistency. It needs someone with more staying power."

Patrick Carney, chairman of the board, proposed an amendment clarifying the board's role in the content of the Collegian, Royal Purple and advertising.

The board unanimously decided to amend the by-laws to say the board has no control over the content.

Carney also proposed that a three-fourths majority of the members of the board must vote to make any future changes in the by-laws.

This also passed unanimously, as did an amendment introduced by Fortmeyer that created first and second readings for the by-laws amendments.

"Having first and second readings and dividing amendments between two meetings allows members to consider the changes with a bit more insight and a bit more thought than a hasty decision at one meeting," Fortmeyer said.

"Most governing bodies go that way, and it makes a lot of sense."

Carol Oukrop, director of the school of journalism, said Todd Simon will take over her job July 15, so he will be the chairman of the board.

In anticipation of next year's board, Carney encouraged members to enforce the attendance policy. Not all of this year's board members adhered to the policy.

"We started out the year with lot of enthusiasm," Carney said.

"But it just seemed to die away real quick."

Persian Gulf illness could become public threat

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — Some medical professionals treating sick Persian Gulf War veterans claim they have contracted symptoms of Gulf War illness and say the mysterious disease could pose a public health threat, the Los Angeles Times reported.

The doctors, nurses and researchers say they are suffering from fatigue, fever, aches, rashes and respiratory problems generally associated with the mysterious syndrome, the newspaper reported Sunday.

"Everyone in this office has had Gulf War illness," Garth Nicolson, a biochemist at the nonprofit Institute for Molecular Medicine, told the paper. "I lost four teeth and had part of my lower jaw removed."

Nicolson has claimed to have found a genetically altered version of mycoplasma, a microorganism known to sometimes cause disease, in the blood of half of the several hundred sick veterans he has tested. He says antibiotics have successfully treated some of them.

But Defense Secretary William S. Cohen told reporters, "We know of no evidence that Gulf War illness is contagious."

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta had a similar opinion.

"Our studies have not linked Gulf War syndrome with any infectious agent," said Bob Howard, special assistant to CDC Director David Satcher. "We are not aware of any valid, scientific evidence that supports a link between Gulf War syndrome and a specific infectious agent."

Howard said the agency has not reviewed Nicolson's studies but called on any researcher with data to share to do so. He said any findings should be published and subjected to field review.

In its final report two months ago, the Presidential Advisory Committee on Gulf War Veterans' Illnesses discounted Nicolson's theories. But doctors at Walter Reed Army Medical Center recently agreed to work with Nicolson, and the Senate Veterans Affairs Committee has vowed to investigate the contagion question.

Dr. Charles Hinshaw of Wichita, a former president of the American Academy of Environmental Medicine, said he hasn't become sick treating Gulf War veterans, but he believes that many of their illnesses are contagious.

"If I was running the Red Cross or I was part of the Department of Defense, I'd say, 'Let's don't take any more blood from veterans until we answer this question,'" Hinshaw said.

Nicolson said mycoplasma and other bacteria have long incubation periods.

More than five years after the war's end, "we're just now beginning to see second-hand exposures in physicians and nurses," said Nicolson, adding, "This is not going to go away, just slowly spread."

SANDY KEYER of Manhattan takes the morning bread to the display racks. Sandy and her husband, Paul Samarrai, own the Babylon Bakery and Cafe at 3003 Anderson Ave.

A kneading love

New cafe provides baker with outlet for what he loves to do

All one has to do is watch Paul Samarrai baking to know he loves what he does.

"I'm in love with my field," he said as he kneaded a ball of dough that would later be a bowl for homemade soup. In the kitchen of Babylon Bakery, at 1:30 a.m. on a Saturday, Samarrai prepared bread and pastries for the next day, much like he's done almost every night for the four weeks he's been in business.

"Why else would I get up at midnight and bake until morning?" he asked. "You know it's a labor of love."

Samarrai, with his wife and partner Sandy Kever, owns and operates the Babylon Bakery and Cafe in Manhattan on Anderson Avenue west of Seth Childs Road in a row of shops adjacent to the Village Plaza shopping center.

Samarrai is a graduate of the American Institute of Baking in Manhattan. He's certified as a research baking technologist, so his experience qualifies him to design new baking products.

Samarrai worked in a variety of trades until the age of 33, but came up empty in his search for something he liked doing.

"It's how life goes sometimes," he said. "We grow up and go to work, but we don't always know what we want to do."

Samarrai enrolled at AIB at the request of his father, having never baked before in his life. To his surprise, he found he enjoyed it.

After ten years of study, he went to work as a consultant, building his practical skills in the workplace.

Denim portrays street attitude, funk, sexy appeal

VIEWPOINT

LINDSEY FORTMEYER

LINDSEY FORTMEYER is a freshman in pre-journalism and mass communications. She will review the latest in fashion trends in her weekly column. She can reached by email at (lkf8410@ksu.edu).

My yacht wrecks.

I'm stranded on a deserted island, like "Gilligan's Island." I'd be Ginger, the movie star, of course.

In this situation I could easily say goodbye to Franchi, Gucci and Liz Claiborne, but my denims? No way.

Levi's. Guess. Lucky's. Whatever it takes. Jeans are my security, strength and dignity. How else would I run along the sandy island beaches and let waves crash my sun-kissed body?

Yes, everyone has seen uncountable TV and magazine advertisements, all having the same tanned models, wearing a certain brand of denims, reminiscing along the coasts of a scarcely populated island.

They are usually sprawled across the sand with a couple of buttons seductively undone. Yeah, right. The only time real people wear their jeans in this fashion is after indulging in Golden Corral's all-you-can-eat buffet.

The whole island idea is silly, but as for the denim, I can't argue. Denim is a necessity. Denim portrays street attitude, funk and most importantly, a sexy appeal. Just one pair of jeans, overalls or other denim delights can introduce the world to a new you.

Denim has been around since as far back as imaginable.

It's been with us through bell-bottoms, boot-cuts and stonewashes. Who can forget how most of us intentionally rolled the ends of our jeans?

How about stretch jeans? Sometimes I could have sworn that people painted on their jeans — literally.

The idea of denim has remained a constant in our society, but styles have drastically changed. Unfortunately, I'm guilty of previously owning a pair of jeans with cut-out hearts and zippers on the cuffs.

But I am proud to say that I've never stooped so low as to zip up my jeans with pliers, as seen in the movie "Dazed and Confused." I'm sure we've all, at one time or another, worn ill-prevailing styles of denim.

The 1980s were a great era for denim.

Now denim has reached a new high, along with higher prices. But don't be discouraged. There are solutions.

My favorite pair of jeans are my dad's old Levi's. They've been worn, torn and worn again.

Thrift stores always have an array of jeans to choose from.

And as for my brother's retired seventh-grade denim jacket?

It looks great with a pair of black bell bottoms or over slip dresses during those chilly spring afternoons.

New styles for jeans include bell bottoms, hip huggers, carpenter style (jeans with extra pockets and handles) and your average wide-legged Levi's. Jeans skirts with buttons are essential for those warm summer afternoons, along with vests and jackets for the cooler evenings.

Dark denim is making a comeback. It has been known to be an excellent substitute for black leather. Denim has the same sexy, tough attitude, but it's lightweight and more casual.

Whether casual or country, man or woman, everyone can enjoy denim. Denim is casual enough to hike in the wilderness, but sleek enough to hit the city streets.

In this ever-changing world of fashion trends, one craze will always continue to popularize the industries: denim.

The day denim goes out of style is the day Tiffany makes another hit album. More or less, the end of the world.

Now, if I were only lucky enough to be stranded on an island.

WEIRD JUSTICE

A judge in Rome ruled that a 24-year-old man was entitled to live with his mother even though she doesn't want him to.

Said the woman, "If he comes home then I'm [leaving]."

In a 1996 case reported by the Associated Press in December, Italy's Supreme Court refused to convict several of a 6-year-old girl's relatives who had had sex with her, citing the strangeness and "particular[ity]" of the family environment.

The court said the family's ordinary relationships were wild, "dominated uniquely or almost always by instinct."

Pacino gives new life to mobster genre

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Al Pacino might be the best Mafioso living outside of prison.

Granted, he only plays gangsters on film, but his screen persona is so conditioned by his past performances in such excellent films as Francis Ford Coppola's "Godfather" series that seeing him undertake another mobster role is like opening up a favorite book.

Pacino can be thanked for almost single-handedly lending a vast humanity to his new film, "Donnie Brasco," that aims to revitalize the mob movie.

In Brasco, Pacino, as Lefty Ruggiero, doesn't play the boss, but rather a Willy Loman character fighting at the fringes of success and always one step behind. He is befriended by the young jewel thug Brasco (Johnny Depp), an undercover FBI agent, Joe Pistone, fixing to bust up the New York mob scene.

Ruggiero sees Brasco as his opportunity to gain some more credibility with the family and, possibly, more control. It is such a distressing situation for an audience. We know that Ruggiero deserves better, but Brasco is right.

And when Brasco slowly immerses himself further into the lifestyle of the mafia, he begins to lose touch with his FBI counterparts and his wife (Anne Neche).

Movie Review

Although this movie fits usual conventions and perhaps has been told in other ways before, director Mike Newell ("Four Weddings and a Funeral") has crafted a film full of passion, lost opportunity, scheming and tough choices. Perhaps it took someone other than Martin Scorsese to reinvent — that may be a bit strong — the mob movie.

But "Donnie Brasco" is no Hugh Grant, tea and crumpets, drawing room romance. Newell is a gifted filmmaker who understands the human condition, filling "Brasco" with gritty, real New York situations and black leather coat characters, not stereotypical Italian mobsters.

If the film is a little too real, it is based on Pistone's 1989 book "Donnie Brasco: My Undercover Life in the Mafia." The screenplay has been nicely adapted from the book by Paul Attanasio ("Quiz Show").

The reality of mob movies achieves its greatest effect in the hands of great actors, which could explain why there are few, if any, independent films in the genre.

"Brasco" is no exception with its excellent powerhouse supporting cast of a fierce Michael Madsen as the always tough Sonny, and Bruno Kirby filling in as the Joe Pesci look-alike for Nicky. Neche, who plays the teary or crying wife character in every scene, is left to fend for herself in this sea of machismo and, expectedly, leaves little impression.

No bother, because at its heart, "Brasco" is a buddy movie for Pacino and Depp. "Brasco" begs the question why these two brilliant actors have not been brought together before.

Depp is exerting himself as a leading man for "Brasco," giving a tough and remarkable performance slightly evocative of young Robert De Niro in "Mean Streets."

De Niro is practically the only other actor, save Pacino, who consistently wows us with mobster roles. But where De Niro is a much more physical and brooding mobster, Pacino is almost purely cerebral.

Never does his physical acumen scare us while he intensely thinks out his life, playing each plot to its final consequence. When things go awry for he and Brasco, leaving town doesn't cross his mind.

Pacino's Ruggiero is a man who has known no other life than the family life. To betray it would be to betray himself. The tragedy of Ruggiero isn't so much him losing his life for Brasco, but losing Brasco from his life.

It's a powerfully sensitive statement for a mobster and a stunning turn in a brilliant actor's career.

Missile might have shot jet

ASSOCIATED PRESS

RIVERSIDE, Calif. — Newly disclosed evidence "points to a missile" as the cause of the explosion that killed all 230 people aboard TWA Flight 800 off New York's Long Island, the Press-Enterprise reported Monday.

The evidence includes reddish residue found on several seat backs that laboratory analysis showed to be "consistent with solid missile fuel" ingredients, the newspaper reported.

It reported information from FBI and National Transportation Safety Board documents and investigative sources indicates the plane may have been a victim of a terrorist missile or friendly fire — a Navy weapon gone astray.

The FBI repeated it had no proof of a missile, although it has not ruled one out as a possible cause of the July 17 crash. The Navy again denied any role in the disaster.

Investigators say a missile remains one of three theories, along with a bomb or mechanical failure.

The paper also said tapes to be released later this week by the Federal Aviation Administration suggest a projectile moving at 1,500 mph was on a collision course with the plane just before it exploded over the ocean during a flight to Paris.

"That's not true," FAA spokeswoman Diane Spitaliere said Monday. "We're not releasing anything."

Materials involved in the investigation were already sent to the NTSB, she said.

The report stated compelling testimony indicated a missile hit the plane on the right side, forward of the wing, passing through the fuselage without exploding.

"The source of the missile remains unclear, with speculation centering on either a terrorist attack or friendly fire, possibly a secret Navy weapons test gone wrong," the paper reported.

Investigators say an explosion in the plane's nearly empty center fuel tank broke the huge aircraft in half.

The cause of that explosion has not been officially declared.

MOVIE

Balderson said he has received numerous calls, and interest in the movie has been high.

"There've been some great people that have called that I'm looking forward to seeing," Balderson said.

Characteristics Balderson said he is looking for include experience and a severe personality.

"The film is about being angry," Balderson said.

Audition dates will be announced later.

Balderson said he also plans to incorporate well-known actors into his work.

"I am negotiating with people who are recognizable," Balderson said. "I still want to look at people from around here, because why the hell not?"

Balderson said he is not the first to attempt a film like his, but that most have been unsuccessful.

"A lot of people are afraid and aren't intelligent. If they turn adversity into advantage, they'll succeed," he said.

"Pep Squad" is based on Balderson's experiences at the California Institute of Art.

"It's completely a metaphor for dealing with groups of people," he said. "It's something I wrote last May based on my experiences with film school and the experiences in my life."

Balderson also expresses himself through other forms of art, including painting, photography and poetry.

> They're morons. Nimrods. A lot of them weren't so much odd as people calling with no experience, just thinking it would be a fun thing to do, having no idea of the magnitude.
> • Steve Balderson
> independent director

Throughout his apartment, Balderson has displayed several paintings on canvas and wood.

Balderson uses vivid colors to express himself.

"I love color. Blue is my favorite."

Although the first film has not yet been shot, he has already begun to work on the second.

"My first film will establish me as an artist with extreme talent," he said. "I'm not afraid of saying so."

Balderson said he believed his next film would win him an award for best director.

Balderson is working with Eric Sherman, formerly of Paramount Pictures.

"His father was a director, so he grew up in the industry," Balderson said. "I admire him a lot."

Sherman graduated from Yale, where he was Scholar of the House in film. He was a production executive at Paramount Pictures.

Sherman is the production consultant and co-producer for "Pep Squad."

Balderson said he is making his film independently because of artistic expression.

"I'm very excited and terrified. I have no idea what I've gotten myself into," Balderson said.

Balderson said he is interested in working with famous actors. He'd also like to mold talent.

"I would like the challenge of directing someone horrible and make them good," he said.

Expenses are another factor that will affect the movie. Balderson will not be paying with the money out of his own pocket.

"I have private investors. I'm not paying for it monetarily. I'm paying for it in other ways," Balderson said.

This is not the first film Balderson has written and directed.

He has made eight films throughout high school and college.

Balderson made four films in college, including "Children of Darkness," "By the Light of the Moon" and "Eleven Eleven."

"Basically all of my stories are about the fine line society crosses between being sane and insane," Balderson said.

"We're dancing on the edge constantly," he said.

Balderson has only shown his previous films to friends and his professors.

"Pep Squad" will be world-wide, in video stores and on cable, he said.

The film will be shot using 35 mm film stock.

"I know exactly what I'm doing. I've analyzed every single shot I'm doing ,and I'm prepared," he said.

"Pep Squad" doesn't fit under any particular label, Balderson said.

"If you look at everything I could do, it's either a quirky comedy or a dark drama," he said.

"It just depends on how you want to market it," he said.

Jennifer Grace, senior in theater, is Balderson's assistant director.

Grace said that being in the theater department at K-State has given her a lot of training, and the ability to better understand theater and movies.

"It's helped me a lot, though. I really think I wouldn't have an idea of what I wanted to achieve," Grace said.

BABYLON

"I never stayed anywhere for more than a year," said Samarrai, now 45. "Why get stuck in a nine-to-five job working for someone else? I just needed the experience."

During that time, he said, his mind was always set on running his own business. He met Kever in Kansas City, he said, and the two began to make plans. Borrowing money from Samarrai's father, they returned to Manhattan and set up shop.

The menu at Babylon includes seven choices of sandwiches, with names like the Hammurabi and the Tower of Babel, and a long list of breads, cookies and pastries. Babylon also serves seven different coffee blends imported from around the world, from Mexican Altura to Sumatra Mandheling.

Posters that list coffees of the world and cross-reference herbs with medicinal properties hang on the walls. A bronze plaque that describes Persian astrology greets customers as they walk in the door, and tea steamers from Iraq take up space here and there, with other Middle Eastern artifacts and decorations.

"My grandfather was director of antiquities for Sanarra, in Iraq," said Samarrai, who is half Iraqi. "Most of what we have on display here came from my dad's house."

The effect is a somewhat exotic yet homey atmosphere that seems to be working, despite the lack of direct advertising. The Babylonian princess that graces their menus won an award for Ag Press, which came up with the design.

"We asked for a copy of the award," he said, "and they told us it would cost us five bucks. I passed."

Kever said she was surprised the first week when word-of-mouth brought customers until they spilled out the front door.

"They were all very patient," she said. "I told them when they came in that I was sorry they had to wait. They just looked at me and said, 'You're new, and it's OK.'

"Everybody in Manhattan's just been great to us," she said. "I just love people, all kinds of people. I think everybody has a need to be pleased, and I want to please this town."

Samarrai said Babylon could have been opened without the benefit of his extra experience in the field, but he didn't want that.

"We could have opened 10 years ago, but the product would have been only half as good," he said. "We want the community to know that we'll go to extra lengths for them."

Babylon donates bread it doesn't sell to the Flint Hills Breadbasket, a local charity organization.

Samarrai said he is pleased by the size of the lunch crowd, but hopes more patrons will come in for breakfast. He said overnight workers such as police officers might like the coffee and pastries when they open at 6 a.m.

Samarrai is able to take special orders for bakery items, but he said his operation is a little young to handle every order.

"I got an order recently for an egg bread, for Easter. I can do that," he said. "I want everyone to tell us what they think of us. Tell us what they like, what they don't like, what they want, and we'll try. I can't make any promises, but we'll try."

Samarrai typically works 14-hour days, six days a week.

"Being tired isn't an option," he said. "This is what all that work training my mind and body for baking was for, so I could run my own business."

has not heard enough support from the public to make it a priority for him. But he has stopped short of saying he would veto a bill if it reached his desk.

Senate President Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, is pushing for a constitutional amendment — which Graves wants — that would let the people decide if they want to authorize the Legislature to regulate concealed carry.

The bill also requires applicants to complete a handgun training course.

It would bar concealed weapons in a school, jail, police station, polling place, government meeting or any bar or restaurant that serves alcohol.

A first license would cost the applicant $125, with $100 going to the Kansas Bureau of Investigation which would issue the licenses and $25 going to the local sheriff.

A renewal license would cost $100, with an $80-$20 split between the KBI and the sheriff.

we could get the extra edge."

The meet Seiler was speaking of was the USA Indoor Championships Feb. 27 and 28.

Rovelto said he thought competing in a big national meet of that caliber beforehand helped a great deal.

"I don't think there's any question," he said. "It certainly is a major factor."

K-State seemingly hit no rough spots along the way even with the two male athletes who competed.

Keith Black finished fifth in the 400-meter dash, and his time of 46.44 was his personal best.

The indoor season comes to a close for K-State, which immediately moves to the outdoor season this weekend at the College Station Decathlon-Heptathlon in College Station, Texas.

"I have extremely high expectations," Rovelto said. "I know everyone is training hard, and I am anxious to see what success we have."

CLINTON

that he should have been told about the agency's suspicions. "It didn't happen. It should have happened. It was a mistake."

But the FBI statement released Monday evening said, "The FBI placed no restriction whatsoever on the dissemination up the chain-of-command at the NSC on any information provided to the NSC senior staff by the FBI during the June 3, 1996 briefing."

It said senior officials of the bureau's national security division briefed two senior staff members of the NSC about the possible covert activities of a foreign government in the United States. One of the people receiving the briefing was an FBI agent detailed to the NSC.

Government sources identified the FBI detailee as Edward J. Appel and the other NSC staffer as Rand Beers.

Responding to the FBI's statement, McCurry said the two NSC officials have been questioned by the White House legal counsel.

"They are adamant in recalling specifically that they were urged not to disseminate the information outside the briefing room," he said.

On Capitol Hill, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said FBI agents approached her in San Francisco in late 1991 and early 1992 with a caution that China is going to attempt to get funds into campaigns in the United States.

Pelosi said she heard nothing more about the issue until last June, when the FBI again came to her with similar warnings.

Democratic Sens. Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein of California and Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York said they also received FBI briefings last year.

McCurry asserted that the FBI instructed the national security officials to keep the information to themselves, secret even from their White House bosses and the president himself. "I'm told that's not routine," the White House spokesman said.

Separately, a senior law enforcement official said, "There is no factual reason why the FBI could not have briefed top White House officials about any foreign effort aimed at congressional campaigns. There's no allegation about White House misconduct."

The president ordered his top lawyer, Charles F.C. Ruff, and his national security adviser, Sandy Berger, to find out why the FBI allegedly insisted that the White House briefing be kept confidential.

Clinton suggested he was angrier about the matter than he appeared. "What I seem and what I feel may be two different things," the president said, answering questions at a news conference with visiting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

Despite Clinton's ire, McCurry said the president still had confidence in FBI Director Louis Freeh. "I did not suggest that anything has moved to the level of being a personnel-action item because it's not at that stage," the spokesman said.

Senator might face impeachment for ad

The contents of a negative campaign advertisement criticizing a candidate for student body president might be grounds for impeachment for Student Senator Sean Tomb.

The ad, which ran in Tuesday's Collegian, criticized Aaron Otto, accusing him of increasing student fees every year since 1993. At the bottom, it said it was paid for by the Committee for Responsible Student Government, with Tom Bisright as treasurer.

But it was Tomb who really purchased the ad. He paid for it with money collected from a group of 10 students, which he said was not affiliated with any other presidential candidates.

Tomb

The letters in Tom Bisright spell "Tomb is right," and he said the group created the committee name for the ad. He refused to say who the other members of the group were or whether they were senators.

"It's just voter information," Tomb said. "The voters can just use it as they see fit. It's similar to third parties in congressional elections. It's just getting the information out."

The ad itself is not a violation of election regulations, Sean Asbury, Elections Committee chair, said. However, not using his real name might put Tomb's Senate seat in danger.

"At this time, we believe that there could possibly be grounds for impeachment," Aubrey Abbott, Senate chair, said. "Senator Tomb misrepresented himself through fraud in the advertisement, which would be conduct unbecoming for a senator."

In order to begin the process, someone would have to introduce legislation for impeachment.

Tomb said the suggestion of impeachment came from senators who do not agree with his political opinions.

Ray Meyers, hot foods work leader in the K-State Student Union

SINCE 1993, Ray Meyers, hot foods work leader in the K-State Student Union, has been in charge of almost all food preparation in the Union Stateroom. Meyers prepares food for about 500 people a day.

He smiled across the table as he took off his hat and ran his calloused fingers through his short, bristly hair.

"I don't think I'll ever fully retire. I might just slow down some," said Ray Meyers, hot foods work leader in the K-State Student Union.

Meyers, a 52-year-old chef, has been in charge of almost all food preparation in the Union since 1993. He and his crew of four workers are in charge of preparing food for the Kitchen Classic, potato and chicken food lines in the Union Stateroom.

They prepare all food served at the buffet line in the Bluemont Room as well. Meyers also is in charge of all food preparation for banquets and catering events done by food services.

Meyers puts in 40 hours a week at food services, preparing food for more than 500 people a day.

"I enjoy the people and students who I work with. It's great being around younger people because it makes me feel younger," Meyers said.

Meyers sees himself as a positive father figure for the students he works with.

Guest discusses Tibetan history, needed sanctions

JOHN HENDERSON
staff reporter

Tibet is a country that modern history has pushed to the side, and its people, most in exile from their native land, have a lot of history to recapture, said Karma Zurkhang, director of the Tibetan Alliance of Chicago.

"Our issue, the issue of Tibet, transcends religion or politics. Our issue is linked with the survival of humanity at large," he said.

Zurkhang spoke as a guest of Amnesty International Group 254, the chapter local to K-State, in the Union Ballroom Tuesday night.

Zurkhang attempted to describe Tibet as it was before it was invaded by communist China in 1949. That is, the Tibet that existed before he was born.

"I wish I had been around to see that Tibet," he said. "I wish I had been able to do something."

Zurkhang urged Americans to push for economic sanctions against China in the hopes that the pressure will inspire China to rethink its human rights violations in its unlawful occupation of Tibet.

"Sanctions do work," he said. "Look at apartheid. That could not have come about without sanctions. If we don't impose sanctions, it's like taking China for a ride for which we'll all have to pay someday."

Zurkhang said he spoke with an older Tibetan who had escaped to the United States. The older man remembered that 40 years ago, China showered money into Tibet with the message of liberation.

"The man said, 'Maybe this great country is in for an economic invasion,'" Zurkhang said. "It's tempting to buy from the Chinese, because they are very cheap. But money isn't everything. We must consider who made what and at what cost.

"Is the United States not capable of producing shoes or food for its people? Think about it."

Tibet was a country with a large land mass, but with a very sparse population, he said, enjoying a lucrative trade relationship with its neighbors. The trade began with food and clothing, and led to the import of Buddhism from India.

The Dalai Lama arose as the top religious and political position of Tibet in the 1600s. The first Dalai Lama agreed to be the spiritual leader of China's Buddhist population, and the two countries existed in relative harmony.

Budget threatened by potential tax cuts

BECKY WINTER
staff reporter

Potential tax cuts could negatively affect K-State, Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, told the Faculty Senate during a video conference Tuesday night.

"The tax-cutting frenzy has me worried. It is very easy to vote for a tax cut, but it is not very easy to vote for a budget cut," she said. "We're heading for a financial train wreck."

Oleen said one potential threat for K-State is not getting a $7.5 million technological fund needed to update technology on campus. She said she is leery of the tax cuts that could affect the future of that fund.

"My concern is that if we make the cuts, I can't make these promises. We can't have it both ways," she said.

Another danger for K-State is the $860,000 tuition shortfall in the Kansas Board of Regents' tuition revenues that is being considered by a state Senate sub-committee, Oleen said.

Jeff Peterson, state representative from Manhattan, was named to the committee.

Faculty Senate also discussed the implementation of an honor system that would hold students to a code of academic honesty.

The proposal was sent to the Academic Affairs Committee for further consideration, because Senate said more issues needed to be addressed, such as the practicality of implementing the proposal on campus.

"The big question seemed to be whether or not we could implement this into the culture," David Balk, Faculty Senate president, said. "An infrastructure needs to be established, but the faculty has to support it in order for it to be successful."

Gerald Reeck, senator, said he agrees that the proposal will be difficult to put into effect.

"We all know how difficult it is to change an athletic program. I would say it's 10 times harder to change the culture of cheating," he said.

Mitchell Strauss, who leads the Provost's Task Force for Academic Honesty, said the proposal will require a concerted effort.

"If we just vote on this and stick it in the book, it is no different than before. But if we commit to it, it can make a real difference," he said.

In other business, Senate also approved graduate course and curriculum change, general education changes and a one-time approval of intersession courses for Continuing Education.

Dance company takes the stage despite handicaps

STORY BY PORTIA SISCO

A new kind of dance emerged Tuesday night in Forum Hall.

The Cleveland Ballet Dancing Wheels performed for 30 people. The dance company focuses on developing the talent of dancers with disabilities, including dancers who are confined to wheelchairs.

"It's a new form. As we speak, it's being done," Sabatino Verlezza, choreographer, said. "We take a lot of careful chances with the wheelchair. I ask them to take some chances."

The dance company was founded by Mary Verdi-Fletcher, a wheelchair dancer who was born with spina bifida.

"It's a very unusual dance company. There are dancers who are sitting down and dancers who are like myself who are stand-up dancers," Verlezza said.

The dance troupe, which consisted of three members from the company, performed four selections. Verlezza and Edwina King were the stand-up dancers and Chris Warner was the sit-down dancer.

Warner had polio at the age of 1, paralyzing her from the waist down. Warner used a wheelchair to dance.

The first selection was performed to the music of Antonio Vivaldi's "Four Seasons."

"It's sort of like the east meeting the west, at the same time stand-up dancers meeting sit-down dancers," Verlezza said.

The movements in the first selection were synchronized. The dance focused primarily on upper-body movement, arms and hands.

Another movement, titled "May Rain," was set to the music of the Beatles. The dance dealt with spacial relations and the use of space in dance.

"If the space was made of clay, what is the lasting impression of space?" Verlezza said.

Warner uses a type of wheelchair called a Camber.

It is shaped like a pyramid to allow for easier movement, Verlezza said.

"In the front you can see it has small wheels. Those are Rollerblade wheels," Verlezza said. "It can obviously move very gracefully. If she leans like a skater, she can control the outcome of a turn."

Verlezza said wheelchair dancers had to learn to move in a less than task-oriented way.

"I hope you can see that it's the spirit of the person that's dancing," Verlezza said. "It isn't so much how many legs you have, but the spirit of the movement.

"The chair is Chris' dance shoes."

The company began 17 years ago.

"The company is growing. We are really looking to expand what we do," Verlezza said. "We don't view our work in terms of the impossibilities."

Verlezza said to have a wheelchair dancer the company has to train them.

"Usually people are initially attracted because dance is beautiful. To make that next jump is rather difficult. You have to

DON'T FORGET TO GET YOUR APPLICATION IN SOON

▶ Arts and Sciences Ambassadors applications are available in the dean's office in Eisenhower Hall. They are due by 4:30 p.m. Friday.
Student Health Advisory Committee applications are available in the Office of Student Activities and Services. They are due at 4 p.m. March 20.

▶ 24 HOURS IN REVIEW

These briefs encapsulate the news of the past 24 hours, and they are from staff reports, wire reports and other news services.

▶ NATION AND WORLD

• MILITARY INVESTIGATORS TRY TO COERCE RAPE ACCUSATIONS.

ABERDEEN, Md. — Five women Army recruits said Tuesday that military investigators tried to pressure them into making false claims that they had been raped by their superiors at the Aberdeen Proving Ground.

It wasn't immediately clear whether any servicemen were charged as a result of statements made by the five. The women refused to say whether they had consensual sex with any instructors, which is not allowed.

The military sex scandal broke last November at Aberdeen, a base north of Baltimore. Seven drill instructors at Aberdeen have been charged with sexual harassment, rape or consensual sex with recruits. Three face courts-martial, and the others have been discharged or dealt with administratively.

About a dozen others were suspended as well and are either under investigation or have already faced administrative sanctions.

• DESTRUCTION IN ITS WAKE, FLOOD CREST MOVES TO ILLINOIS.

GRANDVIEW, Ind. — The nation's top disaster official toured flood-stricken southern Indiana under a sunny sky today and offered a ray of hope. He said disaster-relief checks were in the mail.

By today, the Ohio River's dangerous flood crest of the river had moved past Evansville, a city downstream from Grandview that is well protected by a 25-mile levee, and into the rural areas of western Kentucky and southern Illinois.

• STATE TO SEEK DEATH PENALTY IN INTERNET SLAYING CASE.

LENOIR, N.C. — Prosecutors plan to seek the death penalty for a man charged with killing a woman he met through Internet messages about sexual fantasies and torture.

Lawyers for Robert Frederick Glass, 45, entered a plea of innocent Monday at his arraignment.

The nude body of Sharon Lopatka, 35, of Hampstead, Md., was found Oct. 25 in a shallow grave at Glass' rural home in Collettsville. Investigators believe Lopatka died about nine days earlier, and that she had arranged to meet Glass for a sexual torture session.

Glass' attorney maintains Lopatka died accidentally during rough sex.

• PALESTINIANS SEEK OUTSIDE VOICE IN MIDEAST PEACE TALKS.

JERUSALEM — Yasser Arafat infuriated Israel on Tuesday by inviting foreign diplomats to Gaza to discuss the latest Mideast crisis, prompting an Israeli warning that outside intervention could destroy the peace process.

The Palestinian invitation for the weekend conference went to local diplomats from the United States, Europe, the Arab world and Japan.

At the same time, David Levy and other Israeli officials have suggested they would welcome an effort by the United States — which brokered the recent Israeli-Palestinian accord — to mediate.

• YELTSIN OVERHAULING CABINET WITH EYE ON ECONOMY.

MOSCOW — President Boris Yeltsin ordered his Cabinet overhauled Tuesday, following through on promises to shake up a government that has been unable to pull Russia's fledgling market economy out of its rut.

The newly invigorated Yeltsin, who last week castigated his government for lying motionless while the economy drifted, only guaranteed the jobs of two Cabinet members — Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin and his new top deputy, Anatoly Chubais.

Yeltsin gave Chernomyrdin a week to reorganize the government. He said it should be trimmer, with a smaller Cabinet and fewer ministries, although it was not clear how many officials would lose their jobs.

▶ CORRECTIONS AND CLARIFICATIONS

In an article titled "Voters can let SGA know how to vote on garage, student fees, Call-A-Ride" in Monday's edition of the Collegian, information was incorrectly reported. Students will not be voting on replacing mandatory student fees with options fees because Chris Hansen, student body president, did not sign the resolution which would place this on the ballot.

Due to an editor's error, the following five Student Governing Association candidates were not pictured in Monday's Voters' Guide: Robin Cates, who is running for Arts and Sciences senator; Gabe Eckert, who is running for the Board of Student Publications and Agriculture senator; Jay Johnson, who is running for Engineering senator; and Wendy Strevey, who is running for Union Governing Board and Fine Arts Council.

Women's Resource Center offers assistance for violated women

SANDY DAVIS
staff writer

Tucked away on the second floor of Holton Hall, the Women's Resource Center is a little-known resource for K-State students and faculty.

The center serves as an advocate for issues that relate to women, including rape, battery, domestic violence and sexual harassment.

"The role of the Women's Center is generally a very quiet one," Elizabeth Crain, staff assistant at the center, said.

Crain said people don't know about the Women's Center because the primary people who use the service have been raped or abused, and that's not something most victims want to advertise.

The Women's Center gives referrals to University Counseling Services or the Manhattan Crisis Center to women who need someone to talk to.

"If a woman comes in here with a need, I want to help her as much as I can, and if I can't, I'll find her someone that can," Crain said.

Crain said the center's director, Judy Davis, handles the serious crises.

"Judy is very much the local women's advocate, going to court with them and meeting them at the hospital in the middle of the night," Crain said.

The Women's Center also tries to educate students about women's issues around campus. Staff members go to sororities and residence halls to present programs about rape, sexual harassment, domestic violence, relationship problems and gender issues and women's health issues, such as eating disorders.

The center also offers self-defense classes, which are open to all K-State students.

Generally, the center offers two classes a month while classes are in session. They usually educate 80-100 women each semester.

The center is sponsoring several of the programs and lectures for Women's History Month, and it helped put together the Women's History Month display on the second floor of the K-State Student Union. It is also working on plans for a homepage on the Internet.

The center also publishes a newsletter twice a semester. Susan Allen, editor of the Women's Circle newsletter, said the newsletter is sent to K-State's female faculty and staff members. The circulation is about 2,500 readers.

"The newsletter tries to build a sense of unity among staff women on campus," Allen said.

Allen said the newsletter focuses on the interesting things women are doing and tries to recognize their accomplishments.

The Women's Center's primary focus, though, is to help the women who have been abused or raped. The center can get help for women that police might not be able to give.

"There's a lot of things that women need that they can't go to the police for, or counseling," Allen said. "They just need options."

The staff at the center wants to make women aware of the options that are available and get them any help they might need to get through difficult situations.

"You can actually have someone that can help you make informed decisions," Crain said.

Minority symposium to begin Thursday

▶ Want to know more? Additional information on the 1997 K-State/KU Minority Symposium is available in the Minority Engineering Program office in Durland 144.

JASON ELLIS
staff reporter

A long-time rivalry exists between K-State and the University of Kansas, but for several years, minority students in engineering, computer science and business have benefited from cooperative efforts between the two schools.

The 1997 K-State/KU Minority Symposium is scheduled to begin at 9 a.m. Thursday in the Durland Hall atrium.

The day will consist of informational sessions, a career fair of more than 50 companies and a noon luncheon in the Union Ballroom, Thirkelle Howard, director of the Minority Engineering Program, said.

The career fair, Howard said, is open to any student in engineering, computer science or the College of Business Administration.

The informational sessions, presented by engineering and computer science professionals, will discuss topics such as career opportunities and résumé development. Participating companies, faculty and students receiving an invitation may attend the luncheon, Howard said.

Jack Taylor, assistant director of student financial assistance, will be the keynote speaker at the luncheon.

"The theme of the symposium is Pursuit of Excellence, and I will discuss the pursuit of excellence through diversity," Taylor said. "Sometimes we forget diversity is more than diversity in color, but an appreciation of the difference of thoughts and ideas."

This academic year, K-State has more minority students than it has ever had, Howard said.

Money from companies supporting the minority engineering program is divided between K-State and KU and used for scholarships to minority students with a grade point average of 3.0 or higher in engineering or computer science.

The symposium is coordinated through the minority engineering program office, which is part of the dean's office in the College of Engineering. Additional information regarding the symposium is available in the minority engineering program office.

Opportunity dwindles for K-Staters to vote in '97 SGA elections

Time is dwindling for students to let their voice be heard in the student elections this year. In fact, as you read this, you most likely have less than nine hours to do your deed.

You must vote if you want your voice to be heard.

And today, it's even easier to vote because the voting polls are in two convenient locations: the K-State Student Union and Trotter Hall.

Why should you vote? Easy.

The people who win elections set the agenda for things including how your student fees are disbursed.

Last year, less than 15 percent of the student body voted.

But how many griped?

Voting is easy. Just take your student ID and your opinions to the Union or Trotter and mark your selections.

Remember not to wear any election paraphernalia to the polls (things like T-shirts and buttons). It's a no-no, and you can be sent away.

A few last notes: When you vote, be informed. You can still find a tome of information in the Collegian's Voters' Guide on the World Wide Web. Be sure to read Thursday's Collegian for the results.

Now what are you waiting for? Go vote.

GOOD Eats

Manhattan lacks choices for culinary delights

Two weeks ago, a friend and I found ourselves bored with the local restaurant scene.

To combat our blasé attitude toward local cuisine, we decided to get a little adventurous.

So, on the good advice of our friend, the so-called professor, we did something totally outrageous: we drove to Junction City in search of a world-renowned chicken restaurant called Cohen's.

Beginning our trek on a Friday night, our car conversation was going swimmingly until we realized we had driven from one side of Junction City to the other all to no avail.

Now, we did find a good selection of topless bars and adult bookstores, but we came for chicken.

I was driving and, perhaps, showing some visible signs of frustration while my friend was reaching deep within her soul to try and conceptually figure out where this place was supposed to be (see, she had eaten there a few years ago and supposedly knew where it was).

When her extra-sensory perception failed us, we stopped at a gas station to ask directions.

It turns out our little, world-renowned chicken shack burned down a few years ago. That still doesn't explain why our friend, the professor, would have encouraged us to go there, unless it was a plan to waste our time and cause frustration.

Why do I share this pathetic story?

In case you haven't noticed, there are fewer and fewer choices of restaurants in Manhattan. And those we do have can be a bit, well, you know.

The recent news that the city is selling some property to a developer to build a Chili's restaurant is a sad example of the state of local restaurants.

I've always considered Chili's to be an Applebee's Neighborhood Grill & Bar with more salsa. But instead of nostalgic stained glass for light fixtures, Chili's gets a little wacky with over-turned copper pots as lights. I think that's the only difference between the two establishments.

Therefore, the addition of a Chili's to Manhattan will only mean one thing: shorter lines at Applebee's. I dare someone to argue the addition of a Chili's will mean an infusion of culinary creativity to our regional cuisine. The very idea is laughable.

Other pitiful examples abound.

Take, for instance, the Village Plaza restaurant scene, which I'm pretty sure is built over an Indian burial ground because few, if any, restaurants have survived past infancy. The old Old Chicago restaurant is running out of exotic locales to evoke (such as Chicago and Boston).

There are relatively few custom restaurants — those where the food is freshly prepared on the premises, as opposed to having been trucked in from some out-of-state deep freeze.

The always-provocative Texas Star/Hibachi Hut combo and the decidedly upscale Harry's Uptown come to mind. The grilled entrees and salad at Little Apple Brewing Co. are notable.

There are nearly four good sandwich shops in Aggieville that vary their ingredients just enough to be different.

For a student, though, dining out can prove a bit harder on our meek budgets.

The downfall of the Ramada Inn's Memories restaurant wasn't so much its ho-hum food as it was its pretentious atmosphere that didn't welcome the casual dining of students or even professors.

It was a sad situation, too, because the restaurant was a mere block off campus and should have been packing them in.

When parents come to visit Manhattan, they don't necessarily want to take their kids to a tired chicken-breast-and-rice-pilaf hotel restaurant when livelier joints beckon.

I hope the Gold Fork (which recently won the Collegian's first Manhattan's Dorkiest Name for a Restaurant competition) will improve upon its ancestors with a good menu and acceptable decor.

The owners have noticeably poured some money into its rehabilitation, which creates the appearance of a stand-alone restaurant. If anything, this eye-teaser will attract a crowd for the first few months. After that the restaurant's staying power will rest on its food standards.

Manhattan still has no suitable Italian restaurant (real food, not fast) to speak of. And those restaurants that do forge into pasta territory do so with mixed results. How many of us have driven to Topeka to eat at the consistently fine Olive Garden?

After complaining at length about the local scene to the professor, he shrugged his shoulders and told me to cook at home.

Although I've never shied away from creating a good home-cooked meal, I really just don't have the cooking utensils or serving dishes to pull it off.

Unless, of course, I were to make scrambled eggs on a certain professor's front doorsteps.

Stressing about the talk

Resources are limited to help parents educate children about sex

VIEWPOINT

MARY RENEE SMITH

MARY RENEE SMITH is a junior in theatre. You can e-mail your comments to Mary at (mojo@ksu.edu).

How old were you when your parents gave you "the talk"? It was most likely a series of talks about babies, bodies and bad touches. I bet the first one was about the same time your parents first found you playing doctor with the child down the street.

If you were lucky, it was an ongoing open dialogue using the correct anatomical terminology. If you were unlucky, it was a one-time lecture about morals with vague terms like "down there."

I have two sons ages 8 and 6, and it is time to begin the talk.

As a parent, I knew this was coming. I knew it the day I had children. I have lived in fear of the talk since the moment of their birth. I figured by the time I was called upon to give the talk I would be ready — I'm not.

I figured I would do what all parents do when they don't know what to do — ask their parents. Bad idea. My mother gave me the vague talk, lots of moral lecturing, not much real substance.

This is the woman who told me the only birth control pill I would ever need was an aspirin — I could put it between my legs and keep it there.

I realized last night things would be much easier if I were a Catholic or a Protestant. Then I could just give the moral lecture and be done with it.

I could tell the boys not to touch "down there" and not to touch anyone else until they are married. I could talk about sex as a method of reproduction — an act dreaded by all and engaged in by few.

That's the talk my mother gave and her mother gave before her. It wasn't enough. I never learned that my body was special and wondrous. I was never told I had the right to say no to bad grown-ups who wanted to touch me "down there."

I didn't know sex was an acceptable expression of love and a pleasurable experience I would want when I got older.

MATT HAWKINS/Collegian

So what is a parent to do? If you can't ask your mother, go to the next best source, Barnes & Noble Booksellers.

It's 1997, the sexual revolution has come and gone, and we have come far. There have been pregnant women on Sesame Street; surely there are tons of books for children about sex and stuff.

Surely, there are lots of full-color, anatomical correct books with age-appropriate information and a resource list for parents in the back of the book. Right?

Wrong. I went to Barnes & Noble Booksellers on the Country Club Plaza in Kansas City, Mo.

I went in search of knowledge with the assumption that if you can't find it in a four-story bookstore, you aren't going to find it.

There are books about everything there. There are books that are useful to an incredibly small number of children and families. There is a book titled "Our New Baby is From China."

There is an entire shelf and a half about dealing with alcoholism but not quite half a shelf with books about sex or sex education.

Not that books dealing with alcoholism aren't important, but all children need to know about their bodies and sex. Not all children come from alcoholic families. (Thank the gods.)

The books that are available divide the subject into two categories. There are the books about — literally — the birds and the bees, and there are books about your changing body.

There is nothing for the child who understands that babies don't come from the stork but who isn't growing facial hair.

I did find one book. It is aimed at parents — there are no pictures. It doesn't address many of the things I wish it did. I will continue my quest. I will try the library and a few other book stores.

Maybe I am ready to give the talk. I know what I don't want to say, and that's a beginning. Wish me luck.

• K-STATE SHOULD LOOK TO FORT HAYS FOR CALL-A-RIDE PROGRAM.

Editor,

I am writing in response to the Call-A-Ride program that has been in the Collegian the past two weeks.

I do not see the limitations on the program that is hindering its startup. The cost of the program does seem to be astronomical, but why is that so? Are they looking at buying brand-new vehicles to run the service?

Why not use vehicles already owned by the college or try to solicit some deal from one of the area cab companies?

Fort Hays State University already has the program. They have had it for the last four years, and its name is "The Ride."

It is run and supported by the university. It uses the area cab company as its drivers. It is totally free — you call the cab, they come and pick you up at the bar and take you home. Does this sound familiar?

However, I have heard they will charge a dollar to use the service here at K-State. A little ironic, don't you think?

However, I personally do not know how it is funded, but maybe the esteemed K-State can swallow some of its pride and call on one of the smaller regents schools to get some advice on this subject.

If Fort Hays can do it, K-State can do it, right? Maybe it shows that bigger isn't better — as I have found out.

• TODD STEWART DOESN'T GIVE WOMEN'S BASKETBALL TEAM THE CREDIT THEY DESERVE.

Editor,

I'm writing in regard to Todd Stewart's column about the women's basketball team.

While I'm glad he has finally come around and realized the greatness of this team, I think it is pathetic how he has gone about doing so. He seems to be one of the many people who have jumped on the bandwagon in the last week. As a fan who has been following the team all season, it is disappointing to see that it took a successful run at the Big 12 tournament championship to make Stewart realize what he's been missing.

Not only that, but I think the way he goes about it is way off the mark. Most of what he talks about is the players' good looks. I'm not saying I disagree with him in that regard, not by any means. I distinctly remember sitting around with my friends Saturday night upon returning from Kansas City, and we couldn't think of any player who was not attractive.

But there's much more to the team than that. I got a chance to meet the players shortly before the game against Colorado in February. I remember being impressed at how down-to-earth they were. Rarely do you see a group of athletes who are that talented but who are also very easygoing and fun to talk to.

You see so many athletes these days who are caught up in how great they are that it was refreshing to see the players so easy to relate to. I also remember the great reaction my friends and I got from the team when we led them in a spirited rendition of the fight song after the final home game.

Finally, as I watched the awards ceremony Saturday night, I felt rewarded for the time I spent supporting the Wildcats. I was very proud of what they had accomplished.

So Stewart, before you go off into your fantasy world of dates, why don't you give the girls the real credit they deserve. It's nice to compliment them on the good looks they got from their parents, but I think they deserve more credit for the great attitudes and personalities they've developed themselves.

Ladies, thank you very much for an exciting season, and good luck in the NCAA Tournament.

Greg Fletchall sophomore in architectural engineering

Editor,

I would like to respond to the column by Todd Stewart in Monday's issue of the Collegian.

I guess I should give credit where credit is due and applaud Stewart for attending a women's basketball game after all of his comments.

But, as a woman, — no, as a human being — I must say that I am thoroughly disgusted by the fact that the most he got from his experience is a heightened desire to bag a woman basketball player due to her looks.

Would the women's team be less worthy of its position in the NCAA Tournament if its members were butt ugly?

Stewart, it saddens me that you honestly don't seem to understand the dumb things you say and write.

But you've made me realize that there is truly at least one man in the world who deserves to be castrated in order to prevent the spread of his genes.

Concealed-handgun bill passes; Senate to take up issue next

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The House today passed a bill, 78-44, that would allow licensed Kansans to carry concealed handguns.

Passage sent the measure to the Senate, where the leadership prefers a public referendum on the issue.

The House considered several other amendments during 2-1/2 hours of debate Monday. The bill advanced Monday on an unrecorded voice vote.

House members voted 68-50 to reject an amendment by Rep. Bruce Larkin, D-Baileyville, that would have required a vote in each of the state's 105 counties at the 1998 primary election.

Voters in a county would have had to approve the question for the concealed carry law to take effect in that county.

The House narrowly adopted an amendment that would require concealed handgun permit holders to have additional training every two years, instead of every four.

"I have no problem with honest citizens carrying weapons," Tom Sloan, R-Lawrence, who sponsored the amendment, said. "My concern is that they have a refresher thought process every two years."

The amendment was adopted on a 60-59 vote.

The House defeated an amendment by Rep. Jim Garner, D-Coffeyville, that would have added $25 to the fee for a concealed carry license. The additional money would have gone to grants for neighborhood crime prevention.

The House also defeated an amendment by Rep. Tom Burroughs, D-Kansas City, to require that permit holders buy trigger-locking devices for their weapons.

Opponents of the concealed carry bill believe it must have some kind of statewide referendum or local option provision before it has any chance of gaining Gov. Bill Graves' signature.

Supporters said that letting law-abiding citizens who have undergone training and have a permit to carry a gun would deter crime. Opponents said that having more people armed would not improve public safety and could lead to more accidental shootings.

IMPEACH

"I think it's a political witch hunt," he said. "I'm just shocked that people would let their emotions carry this far. There's so many people in the body that are involved with Aaron Otto that don't see him the same way me and my group see him."

Stacy Foulk, advertising manager for the Collegian, said she knew Tomb was not Tom Bisright when he bought the ad, but she assumed that Bisright was the real treasurer. She said she would not have sold the ad if she had known it contained false information.

The name wasn't the only thing that was wrong in the ad, Otto said. He said the ad's statement that he had increased fees since 1993 was impossible because he was a Senate intern in 1993 and 1994, without voting privileges. When he was a senator with the ability to vote, most fees stayed the same or decreased, although he did support some fee-increase bills, which eventually failed.

"I sure hope it doesn't start a trend," Otto said of the negative ad. "Who knows what you'll see next year."

TIBET

"China and Tibet were like student and teacher," Zurkhang said. "Tibetans admired the Chinese for their power and wealth, and the Chinese admired Tibet for its spirituality."

After the world wars, China began invading neighboring countries, and Tibet was annexed almost overnight, he said. The Dalai Lama and the rest of what had been Tibet's government went into exile.

"Tibet never thought its neighbors would turn against it," he said.

Zurkhang criticized the philosophy of Buddhism, which he blames in part for Tibet's fall to China. Tibetans were capable of fighting and defending themselves, he said, but the beautiful religion they had imported centuries ago — the one advocating nonintervention in the pursuit of nirvana — proved fatal for Tibet.

"If you ask any sensible Tibetans today who is to blame," he said, "they will say that the Chinese are to blame for invading, but Tibetans were equally to blame for not taking care of our country."

The term Dalai Lama is actually Mongolian in origin, he said.

"Tibet as a nation was there long before Buddhism came," he said.

Tibet has an identity obscured by history, with a religion, Bon, that has almost vanished except for a few scattered effects on Tibetan Buddhist doctrine, he said.

That identity is what Tibet should try to recapture, he said.

Zurkhang theorized that Tibet represents a strategic military post in its geography, making it a political chessboard.

Furthermore, the infusion of Chinese citizens into occupied territory is a violation of the 1949 Geneva Convention. That fails to address the negative effect this has had on the Tibetan identity, he said.

Nevertheless, Tibetans in exile are small in number but can make a lot of noise, which must mean something, he said.

"In over 40 years," he said, "China has failed to conquer Tibet mentally."

Zurkhang urged anyone who is concerned, especially Tibetans, to take responsible action as individuals. He said too much reliance has been placed on the Dalai Lama.

Zurkhang was born and educated outside of Tibet. He now works with other native Tibetans outside the original borders of what was once a landlocked nation among the Himalayan mountains, to maintain their identity as a people without a country.

"What you see before you tonight is a man separated from his people, his culture and his home," he said.

really love this or else it's just a plaything," Verlezza said. "It's not about winning. It's about communicating a thought or a feeling."

Warner has been taking dance lessons for four years.

"In dance, the wheelchair becomes the vehicle of motion," Warner said. "It certainly has a life of its own, and that becomes our life. The chair itself is an inanimate object. For me, it becomes a way to move."

Warner said she was not ever aware of the possibilities until she heard about the dance classes that were offered for people with disabilities.

After the Americans with Disabilities Act was passed, Warner said it began to be easier to get around in a wheelchair, and places became more accessible.

"It was real important in my life to have a normal life," Warner said. "How I thought about it was a reflection of what society thought. As I got older, and as time has passed, that has changed. The idea that I was not limited to what I can do became much more prevalent."

Verlezza, Warner and King led an exercise involving the audience in the dance process. The audience learned a series of movements that were incorporated into a dance that the company members performed.

"Dance is like a language," Warner said. "It's a way that we tell you something. You might get a different feeling than the person sitting next to you."

Verlezza has also choreographed dances that incorporated sign language into the dance.

Warner led a demonstration of different words in sign language.

"We speak with our hands. It's a form of sign language," Warner said. "We also use gestures for dance."

The Cleveland Ballet Dancing Wheels has an affiliation with the Cleveland Ballet Company.

"They dance with us. It's a wonderful experience," Warner said.

Verlezza, Warner and King have been dancing together since fall 1996.

Yagerline said she thought people would spread the message.

"I'm sorry that the audience was not bigger. However, you never know who you're going to touch. It's kind of like they will get that little sparkle in their mind and touch someone else," Yagerline said.

frown on your face.'"

Born and raised in Winston-Salem, N.C., Meyers began cooking at the age of 14. He started working part time in his grandmother's restaurant. When he wasn't working in the kitchen, he was fishing.

"My father and I used to go fishing every day. That's the reason I love it so much," Meyers said.

Fishing is Meyers' No. 1 love. He loves it so much he said the money he makes goes straight to supporting his fishing habit.

When the weather gets warm and spring rolls around, Meyers said he can be found competing in various bass tournaments around the state.

He said he doesn't mind going to tournaments and standing on a bass boat in 110 degree weather, harsh winds or even snow.

"If you fish the way I do, it ends up being harder than work. If I had a job that made me work that hard, I'd quit," Meyers said.

In 1963, at the age of 18, Meyers was drafted into the U.S. Army where he served for 20 years.

While in the Army, he worked as an electric maintenance chief for Hercules Missiles and as a part-time chef at military stations around the world.

From 1974 to 1983, Meyers served as a food service manager in Germany, the Netherlands and the United States. Even now, after retirement from the military, Meyers is an emergency status assistant food manager for the base at Fort Riley.

After retirement from the Army, Meyers worked as a cook in various restaurants. He also had jobs ranging from painting and roofing houses to selling insurance.

"I like to work somewhere until it's no fun anymore," Meyers said.

Meyers likes to live by a simple rule: "You can't be productive if you're not happy. If more people looked at life that way, the world would be a lot better place to live," Meyers said.

He likes to keep busy no matter what he's doing. This might include working two to three jobs at the same time or splitting his hours between cooking and fishing.

Smiling, Meyers said, "Sleep is a waste of time."

Meyers said he doesn't see himself retiring any time soon, but he does have the perfect dream.

He hopes to someday sell his house, buy a recreational vehicle and travel the country with his wife.

"We could find a place to wash dishes and flip burgers to make just enough money to get by," Meyers said.

But his wife isn't too crazy about the idea, Meyers said.

"She needs a place to call home."

With a 2-game sweep of Nebraska, the Cats are experiencing

THAT WINNING FEELING

STORY BY JEREMY KELLEY • PHOTOS BY JILL JARSULIC

It was ideal baseball weather for the K-State baseball team as it tackled the Cornhuskers Tuesday afternoon at Frank Myers Field.

The elements not only set the stage for a good series but also earned K-State two wins over Nebraska, 19-9 and 11-3.

Beaming sunlight glistened brightly in the outfield and a slight breeze blew to the south when the Cats were leading 12-8 in the eighth inning. They blew up for seven runs on just four hits as Nebraska committed three errors in the outfield to assist the Cats in their binge.

"And we took advantage of it, and that's a sign of a good ballclub, and when they made a mistake, we made them pay with a big inning," Coach Mike Clark said. "But we also got 20 hits too, and when you get 20 hits, you're going to score quite a few runs."

For the game, Nebraska tallied seven errors, five of which came in the last two innings. In those two innings, K-State spread its lead to a 10-run deficit.

Center fielder Ryan Buell pinch hit for Eric Sommerhauser in the middle of order in the eighth and blooped a shot to right field. That shot was bobbled by the fielder, and Buell reached second on the error as two runners scored.

The next batter, Scott Poepard, hit a monster to the left field wall, and Brian Bobier scored.

Then Todd Fereday cleared the bases with a homer to left center, and K-State found itself on top, 12-8.

"In the first game we scrapped and competed real hard and did a real nice job," Clark said. "I thought offensively we took advantage of their mistakes and put together a couple of big innings and did well."

Junior pitcher David Meares chalked his second win of the season. Meares pitched one inning, gave up two hits and struck out two.

However, in the nightcap the sun died down and so did the wind.

It was a closer ball game to begin with as the Cornhuskers scored a run in the first and took the early lead.

But K-State scored two more runs before the third and never trailed again in the game.

The Cats were in control and blew open another multiple-run inning in the fifth.

Sommerhauser knocked a two-run double in the bottom of the inning to start the rally, and Heath Schesser kept it going.

Schesser notched his sixth home run of the year as he scored two runs and surged K-State's lead to 7-1.

Catcher Yancy Ayres chopped a single past the Nebraska shortstop and scored two more runs and thus ended the Cats' rally.

"I was happy with our play," Clark said. "We're sitting there with three guys in the middle of our order with tremendous RBI counts."

Pitcher Jason Wells picked up his third victory of the season in a seven-inning performance where he fanned six batters and gave up just two runs.

David Johnson closed out the game in style retiring three straight batters in the ninth with pitches of about 90 mph.

"He needed to get an inning's worth of work before this weekend, and he did a nice job," assistant coach Mike Hensley said. "That just kinda caps the day off real nice for us."

Next up for K-State is a tournament this weekend at Oral Roberts in Tulsa, Okla., against the likes of college baseball's No. 30 Michigan Wolverines.

TODD FEREDAY is congratulated by teammate Jason Bichelmeyer in the eighth inning after hitting a grand slam to help K-State to a seven-run inning. Fereday went 3-4 in the two-game series and hit for the cycle.

SCOTT POEPARD hits a fly ball to left field in game one of a doubleheader against Nebraska Tuesday afternoon at Frank Myers Field. Poepard scored three runs in K-State's 19-9 win.

BRIAN SMOLLER
staff reporter

The K-State baseball team exacted a bit of revenge for the football team, pounding Nebraska in both of its games of a non-conference doubleheader Tuesday, 19-9 and 11-3.

"We took advantage of their mistakes," head coach Mike Clark said

"Anytime you have around 20 hits you are going to score some runs."

The offensive explosion dealt by the Cats was led by the big three for K-State — Heath Schesser, Scott Poepard and Todd Fereday.

Schesser, whose batting average remains at .500 after Tuesday's games, continued his dream season, smashing his sixth home run and 33rd RBI in the second game.

Poepard reached base six times for the Wildcats, reaching on two errors and walking once in addition to his three hits.

Fereday came into Tuesday's series batting .250 and fighting through a mild slump.

"He's just putting too much pressure on himself," Clark said. "I told him to just have fun."

Before the Oklahoma State series this past weekend, Clark didn't question Fereday's ability to rebound.

"He's an outstanding player," Clark said Thursday.

"He'll rebound, and we won't even remember this little stint at the end of the season."

Fereday, who is from Midwest City, Okla., turned out a spectacular performance last Friday in the first game of the OSU series, crushing two home runs and going 3-5 on the day.

But he was unable to get another hit in either of the last two games, going a combined 0-9.

"Being from Oklahoma, that was a big series for him," Clark said. "He put a lot of pressure on himself."

Fereday's grand slam in the eighth inning of the first contest broke open the game for the Cats and sealed the fate of the Huskers.

"I asked him before the game if he was relaxed," Clark said.

"He said, 'I'm always relaxed.' The whole dugout nearly fell over laughing."

Fereday continued with a hot bat pounding out a triple and a double in the second game, going 3-4 and creating a cycle during the two games.

"When Todd was on third in the eighth, I told him 'I think that's the Todd Fereday that everyone knows,'" Clark said.

Fereday's recent resurgence wasn't the only bright spot offensively for the Cats.

Garrett Bell, center field, struggled offensively until Tuesday, going 4-5 with two doubles in the first game.

Bell tripled in the fifth inning of the second game, sparking the six-run inning that would send the Huskers home winless.

"Garrett did great," Clark said.

"Being a freshman, he is experiencing the pressure of this level of play for the first time."

Clark labeled Bell as having the potential to be perhaps the best defensive outfielder in his reign.

"He's still swinging at a lot of pitches that he shouldn't, but we're pleased with what he's done defensively for us," he said.

New York Yankees have ability, talent to repeat as world champions

VIEWPOINT

JEREMY KELLEY

JEREMY KELLEY is a sophomore in print journalism. You can e-mail your comments to Jeremy at (weasal1@ksu.edu).

The New York Yankees.

Last October they were dancing on Seventh Avenue. Last year they were having their gin-and-tonics at the Park Avenue Country Club. Last year they were signing autographs to any little fan who dared to peer at them.

That was last year, and this year is a brand new year — and a few changes have been made to the Yanks' regime that might add a little spice to their quest for another title.

First off I must say I was truly disappointed when Jim Leyritz left for Anaheim. Leyritz was not only New York's hero in game four of the World Series, but he could also be called their best catcher.

Call it an emotional attachment, but I became rather fond of Leyritz when he sat me and another Jeremy I know behind home plate in the house that Ruth built last summer. Turns out he's good friends with my sister's boyfriend in New York. Now, I guess, he's my good friend.

Leyritz and pitcher Andy Pettitte worked together like a well-oiled machine. Leyritz knew what Pettitte would pitch and became so familiar with his velocity and location of his fast ball that the duo couldn't be stopped.

Anyhow, I question the ability of now-catcher Joe Girardi to pick up where Leyritz left off. Girardi did get some time behind the plate last year, usually when the Yanks needed a hot bat. Girardi gives the Yanks another consistent hitter, but finding a sound rhythm with Pettitte will be the tough assignment for Girardi.

Speaking of pitchers, the Yanks lost two of their best pitchers from their championship team of a year ago. Jimmy Key and World Series MVP John Wetteland have moved on to bigger and better things (actually I'm not too sure about better).

But the Yankee front office has done an excellent job of attaining two more solid arms in David Wells and Mike Stanton. Again, this year the pitching staff will secure New York's rise to the top in baseball's most competitive division.

Without a doubt, Wells will fill the void left by Key, and Mariano Rivera could easily pick up as many saves as Wetteland did a year ago.

But fortunately for the Yanks, they did manage to keep Derek Jeter. Monday they signed the 1996 Rookie of the Year to a one-year $525,000 contract — $25,000 less than what he was asking for. Jeter, however, has proved the he can find a comfort zone in Yankee Stadium as he notched 78 RBIs last year — the most since 1983, when Julio Franco knotted 80.

Jeter led off for the Yanks last year, batting .314 with 10 home runs. Jeter needs to provide that top-of-the order spark for the Yanks to propel them through the American League East.

The Yankees have the talent to repeat as World Series champions, but it will be a struggle.

As the Yanks proved last year, spring training means next to nothing as long as everyone stays healthy.

So far this season everyone remains healthy for the most part except for the Yanks' prize possession in Ruben Rivera. Last Wednesday Rivera had orthroscopic surgery on his right shoulder to correct a rotator cuff problem. Rivera, if he stays healthy, will fight for a starting spot in the Yankee outfield.

Darryl Strawberry is still working to erase the DH that usually precedes his name, but this spring, coaches are working on Strawberry's bat and most likely he will join Bernie Williams and Rivera in the outfield by the time the start of the season rolls around.

All the talent New York needs is right there, and they now have the experience they need to return to the World Series. It will be a bit of a bumpier ride for Joe Torre and friends as they progress through the season, but everything will fall into place.

SCOTT M. LADD/Collegian

Although the birth control pill was approved by the Food and Drug Administration in 1960, only recently has the FDA approved the use of the birth control pill after sexual intercourse to prevent an unwanted pregnancy.

The birth control pill is used by an estimated 11 million women in America, according to a press release from the FDA.

The pill's rate of effectiveness, according to the FDA, ranges from 55.3 percent to 94.2 percent, with an average effectiveness of 74.0 percent.

Other methods still have a higher effectiveness rate.

The Reproductive Health Technologies Project established a hotline number (1-800-584-9911) to inform women about this contraceptive method and about providers in their local area.

The Lafene Health Center Women's Clinic offers services for students to determine which birth control methods are appropriate for their lifestyles. Students can contact the Women's Clinic for an appointment or counseling session on birth control at 532-6544.

Some contraceptive options and differences

Intrauterine device (IUD)	• Continuous protection for up to eight years • No need to remember daily	• Can be expelled or perforate uterus • Increases PID risk for some women	97-99 percent
Condom (alone)	• Easily obtained • Best method for STD protection • Good results when used with spermicide	• Can reduce sensation • Less sexual spontaneity • Breakage possible	88-97 percent
Diaphragm (with spermicide)	• Insertion up to six hours before intercourse	• Reapplication necessary • Increases risk of urinary tract infections • Must be left in place from six to eight hours after intercourse • Can cause discomfort	85 percent
Periodic abstinence	• Requires no other intervention • Low cost	• Requires careful planning • Prohibits intercourse up to half of the menstrual cycle • Cannot be used with irregular cycles	80-99 percent

Riemann, Neufeld ready for runoff

Tim Riemann and Jennafer Neufeld, candidates for student body president and vice president, sat and waited anxiously with friends for the phone to ring at the Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity house.

They received the call at 10 p.m. telling them that there was no majority of votes going to either the Riemann or Aaron Otto tickets. As a result, they will be involved in a run-off election with Aaron Otto and Amy Knedlik on Wednesday.

The response from the crowd when they heard the news was mixed.

"I am disappointed, but I know that Jen and Tim can step up to the challenge," Michele Perrier, freshman in biology, said.

She said a lot of people she talked to thought it would come down to a runoff so they didn't vote. She said the same people said they would vote in the runoff.

"I think there will be more interest on campus since it is just between two people," she said.

Riemann, junior in agricultural economics, French and pre-law, felt good about the results even though they didn't win.

"Jen and I feel we've run a campaign we are proud of. We thought we focused on the issues, and it was evident tonight

Otto, Knedlik keep campaigning

Student Body Vice President Aaron Otto's voice resonated through 12th Street Pub as he announced to the crowd of supporters that his presidential ticket would advance to a run-off election.

"One more week, that's all that's left. One more week," he told them.

Because Otto and his running mate, Amy Knedlik, were almost tied with opponents Tim Riemann and Jennafer Neufeld, neither received the 50 percent needed to win the election without a runoff.

See OTTO, Page 6

AARON OTTO and Amy Knedlik address a group gathered at 12th Street Pub Wednesday evening at an election party for the presidential and vice presidential candidates. Otto and Knedlik will have a runoff with Tim Riemann and Jennafer Neufeld next week.

Student body to return to polls to vote in Otto, Riemann runoff

LILLIAN E. BEEBE
staff writer

Students and candidates will have to go to the polls again.

A run-off election between Tim Riemann and Aaron Otto will be from 7:30 a.m. to 6 p.m. on Wednesday in the K-State Student Union.

A polling station for veterinary medicine students will be set up from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. in the Veterinary Medical Sciences Building.

Tim Riemann and Jennafer Neufeld received 37.3 percent of the total votes while Aaron Otto and Amy Knedlik received 36.2 percent.

One ticket must receive 50 percent of the total votes cast to avoid a run-off election, Kathleen Copple, Office of Student Activities and Services graduate assistant, said.

If no candidate captures a majority of the votes, the two candidates with the most votes are picked for the run-off election, Copple said.

The run-off election will not delay the approval of new senators or student government activities or functions, Copple said.

"They are part of the same body but are two separate branches," she said.

For expenditures, each ticket can spend $189 for the runoff, Copple said.

Banners and other poster materials for the two run-off candidates can be left up, she said.

All other candidates had to have their materials down by 9 p.m. Wednesday, Copple said.

If posters are left up, it is considered a campaign violation.

Run-off elections are not uncommon at K-State. In the past 27 elections, 18 have had run-off elections, according to information from Student Governing Association.

The information also says that voter turnout for run-off elections is lower than in general elections.

"If you want to have a say in who represents you, you need to vote," Copple said.

Former K-State student body president appointed to House of Representatives Appropriations Committee

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

A surprise appointment to the Kansas House of Representatives Appropriations Committee has all but overwhelmed Rep. Jeff Peterson, R-Manhattan.

The announcement of Peterson's appointment came Tuesday, following some dropped hints on Monday.

"It's a different experience and people act a little different toward me," Peterson said. "Right now, I'm trying to play catch-up to some of the subcommittee decisions that are being presented."

The appropriations committee is responsible for legislation for the Kansas Board of Regents' budget. Peterson will have to vacate his other committee appointments to taxation, tourism and economic development because appropriations members cannot have other committee appointments.

Because of this, Peterson said his appointment would be a good thing for the district and for K-State.

"It's also important on state-wide issues," he said. "It's always been of importance to Manhattan because of the University."

On Wednesday, Peterson fell into his new duties with an opportunity to look at two items in the regents' budget.

The Subcommittee on Education and Legislative Services supported the addition of $840,000 to the budget to pay for revenue shortfalls due to the introduction of the linear-fee system.

Peterson also seconded a failed motion to return a $7 million technology proposal to the regents' budget. He said the committee has requested a thorough proposal from the regents before it will consider replacing the funding.

"We will have another chance to put it back in the budget," Peterson said. "The technology is the one we need to watch. It's probably the one students are most concerned about."

Although the appointment of a freshman member to appropriations is not unprecedented, it is somewhat rare for such appointments to occur in the middle of the session.

Peterson was appointed to a vacancy after some representatives were shuffled around due to resignations and some moving to the Senate.

Peterson said he did not think he was appointed in an attempt to silence moderates from Manhattan by appointing a Manhattanite to the committee.

"I've been termed a conservative by our local paper, but that was based on one motion in a committee," Peterson said. "When it is all said and done, and I have a record after two years, I think people will see I've been able to balance the party leadership and the constituent needs of Manhattan fairly well."

"I like to look at the whole record — not one incident. The Manhattan Mercury made a judgment — that I think was unfortunate — based on one decision."

The Mercury published an editorial early in the legislative session labeling Peterson a conservative.

Peterson, who graduated in 1996, is a former two-term student body president of K-State. He was elected to the House in November 1996.

Senate committee to pass concealed-gun query to voters

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The Senate Federal and State Affairs Senate Committee on Tuesday approved a resolution calling for a public vote on a constitutional amendment on the issue of concealed weapons.

"If we're going to have the possibility of more concealed weapons in the state of Kansas, then the citizens ought to help make that decision," said Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, the committee's chairwoman.

The resolution went to the full Senate, where Senate leaders will schedule it for debate.

If the resolution is approved by a two-thirds majority in both the House and Senate, it would go to voters in the 1998 general election.

Oleen said her goal is to have enacting legislation ready if voters approve a constitutional amendment permitting concealed carry. She said voters should know what they will be getting if they approve concealed carry.

The House approved and sent to the Senate a measure that would require the Kansas Bureau of Investigation to issue permits for concealed handguns to Kansans who meet certain criteria.

▶ NATION AND WORLD

• SENATE CONFIRMS PENA TO BE ENERGY SECRETARY.

WASHINGTON — Federico Pena, whose nomination was tangled in a month-long dispute over nuclear waste disposal, was confirmed as energy secretary Wednesday by the Senate on a vote of 99-1.

Both Democrats and Republicans called him highly qualified for the Cabinet post, although Pena, the former mayor of Denver and transportation secretary during President Clinton's first term, has had little background in the energy field.

After the roll call, Clinton applauded the Senate for its "strong vote of support."

• COMPLAINTS RAISE QUESTIONS ABOUT ARMY SEX INQUIRY.

ABERDEEN, Md. — Claims from five female recruits who say the Army tried to pressure them into saying they were raped by their superiors could cast doubt on all accusations made since the military sex scandal began.

The women at the Aberdeen Proving Ground said Tuesday they refused to make rape allegations, and are upset the military has not come through with incentives they were promised for cooperating with investigators.

The five women spoke at a news conference held by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The NAACP has claimed the Army unfairly targeted black soldiers based on complaints of white female recruits.

• ISRAEL REFUSES TO INCREASE WEST BANK OFFER.

JERUSALEM — Israel refused Wednesday to reverse plans to build on war-won land in Jerusalem or improve a West Bank troop pullback offer but suggested concessions on other issues could get peace talks back on track.

U.S. Ambassador Martin Indyk told Israel's foreign minister he expected more generous Israeli troop pullbacks in September and in March 1998, when he said "significant" chunks of land should be handed over.

Israel decided last week to surrender 9 percent of the West Bank to Palestinian control in the first withdrawal — one-third of what the Palestinians expected.

• GROUP REPORTS DANGEROUSLY HIGH RADIOACTIVITY ON BEACH.

PARIS — People strolling on a beach near a nuclear processing plant this week were exposed to radioactivity up to 3,000 times higher than usual, a respected independent research group claimed Wednesday.

A section of pipe transporting waste from the state-run nuclear processing facility near La Hague in northeastern France was exposed by record low tides Monday and Tuesday, said Bruno Chareyon, director of the Commission of Independent Research and Information on Radioactivity.

The research group said the maximum level of radioactivity a person can tolerate over a year would have been surpassed in three hours by someone in contact with the waste pipe — although it was unlikely anyone would have had that much contact.

• LETTERMAN NEMESIS BOOKED IN WISCONSIN RUCKUS.

NORTH FOND DU LAC, Wis. — A woman notorious for harassing late night host David Letterman was in jail Wednesday, accused of walking out on a 79-cent restaurant check and resisting arrest.

Margaret Ray, 44, of Danbury, Conn., was kept on $2,000 bond, charged with disorderly conduct and resisting an officer in a scuffle outside the Stretch Restaurant and Truck Stop here.

Ray first made national headlines in 1988, identifying herself as Mrs. Letterman when she was arrested at the wheel of Letterman's sports car at the Lincoln Tunnel, unable to pay a $3 toll. Restaurant manager Cindy Meulemans said Ray came in Tuesday morning with her own food, including hot chocolate, milk and soda, sat down and ordered coffee.

After the waitress poured the 79-cent cup of coffee, Ray said she only had a quarter. Ray then made a phone call and started screaming, Meulemans said.

"When she left, she threw a quarter at the cashier and said to call the cops if we wanted to," Meulemans said.

"During the course of events, she mentioned David Letterman a few times," Lamb said. "At the time it really didn't mean anything to us."

Ray served four months in prison in 1993 for trespassing, after she was found camping on the tennis courts of Letterman's Connecticut home.

She also served 34 days last year in an Indiana jail for shoplifting at a store near Letterman's mother's home.

Burns plans to maintain interest in students

STEVE WARE
staff reporter

Presidential candidates Bill Burns and Greg Miller strained to hear the results of the final tally over the noise of their opponents' supporters, in a room of people who were mostly excited by the election returns.

The candidates for student body president and vice president stood near a wall in 12th Street Pub with a small group of their friends in a room filled mostly with supporters for Aaron Otto and Amy Knedlik.

While disappointed with the results, the candidates were at ease after hearing they received only 182 votes.

"We worked hard and ran a good, fair campaign," Burns said. "It's too bad voter turnout was so low, but it was out of our hands. We had some really good ideas and would have liked to have had the chance to use them. But that's OK."

Miller's response was similar.

"We put our resources together and made a good showing, but we came up a little too damn short," Miller said. "It's unfortunate that the Senate will be stuck in the same mold. I think they've stalled. Their wheels are turning, but they're not getting anywhere."

Burns and Miller's supporters were disappointed the candidates would not have the chance to represent the student body.

"I think they would have done a great job," Amy Mitchell, junior in speech pathology, said. "They're both down to earth and easy to talk to, somebody that the student body could really relate to. I hope they try again."

The candidates' plans for the future differ.

"Greg is graduating next year so he won't be around, but I've really taken an interest in the needs of the students," Burns said. "I stand behind what I supported, and I will be back. You haven't heard the last of Bill Burns."

About their opponents and endorsements for the run-off candidates, neither had much to say.

"Most of the candidates ran pretty good campaigns," Miller said, "but we really can't endorse anyone. We really thought we would be in the runoff. We should have been."

With a nod and a smile Miller headed toward the door.

"Well, I may not be student body vice president, but I will be Paddy Murphy," he said.

Candidates focus on fun rather than loss

BENJAMIN YODER
staff reporter

The Flashback Lounge, below Memory Lanes bowling alley, was filled with Colin Rafferty and Trey Hock supporters Wednesday night, but they left disappointed.

After hearing they finished third, student body presidential and vice presidential candidates Rafferty and Hock sang a karaoke version of "Another One Bites the Dust."

Hock said the disappointment of losing was secondary to the fun they had running in the election.

"We had T-shirts with our names on it. How upset can we be?" Hock said. "I'm glad everyone was there for us."

Rafferty said he was happy people heard about the issues they wanted to talk about, and he said he wanted to inform the voters.

"It was disappointing losing, but I hope the best works out for K-State," Rafferty said.

Rafferty said he thought the Tim Riemann and Jennafer Neufeld ticket was the best to vote for in the run-off election.

"We're throwing our support behind Riemann, so we can get him in," he said. "It was a tight, close run."

Hock said he was pleased they received 269 votes for the amount of money they spent. Hock said they only spent $80 on their campaign.

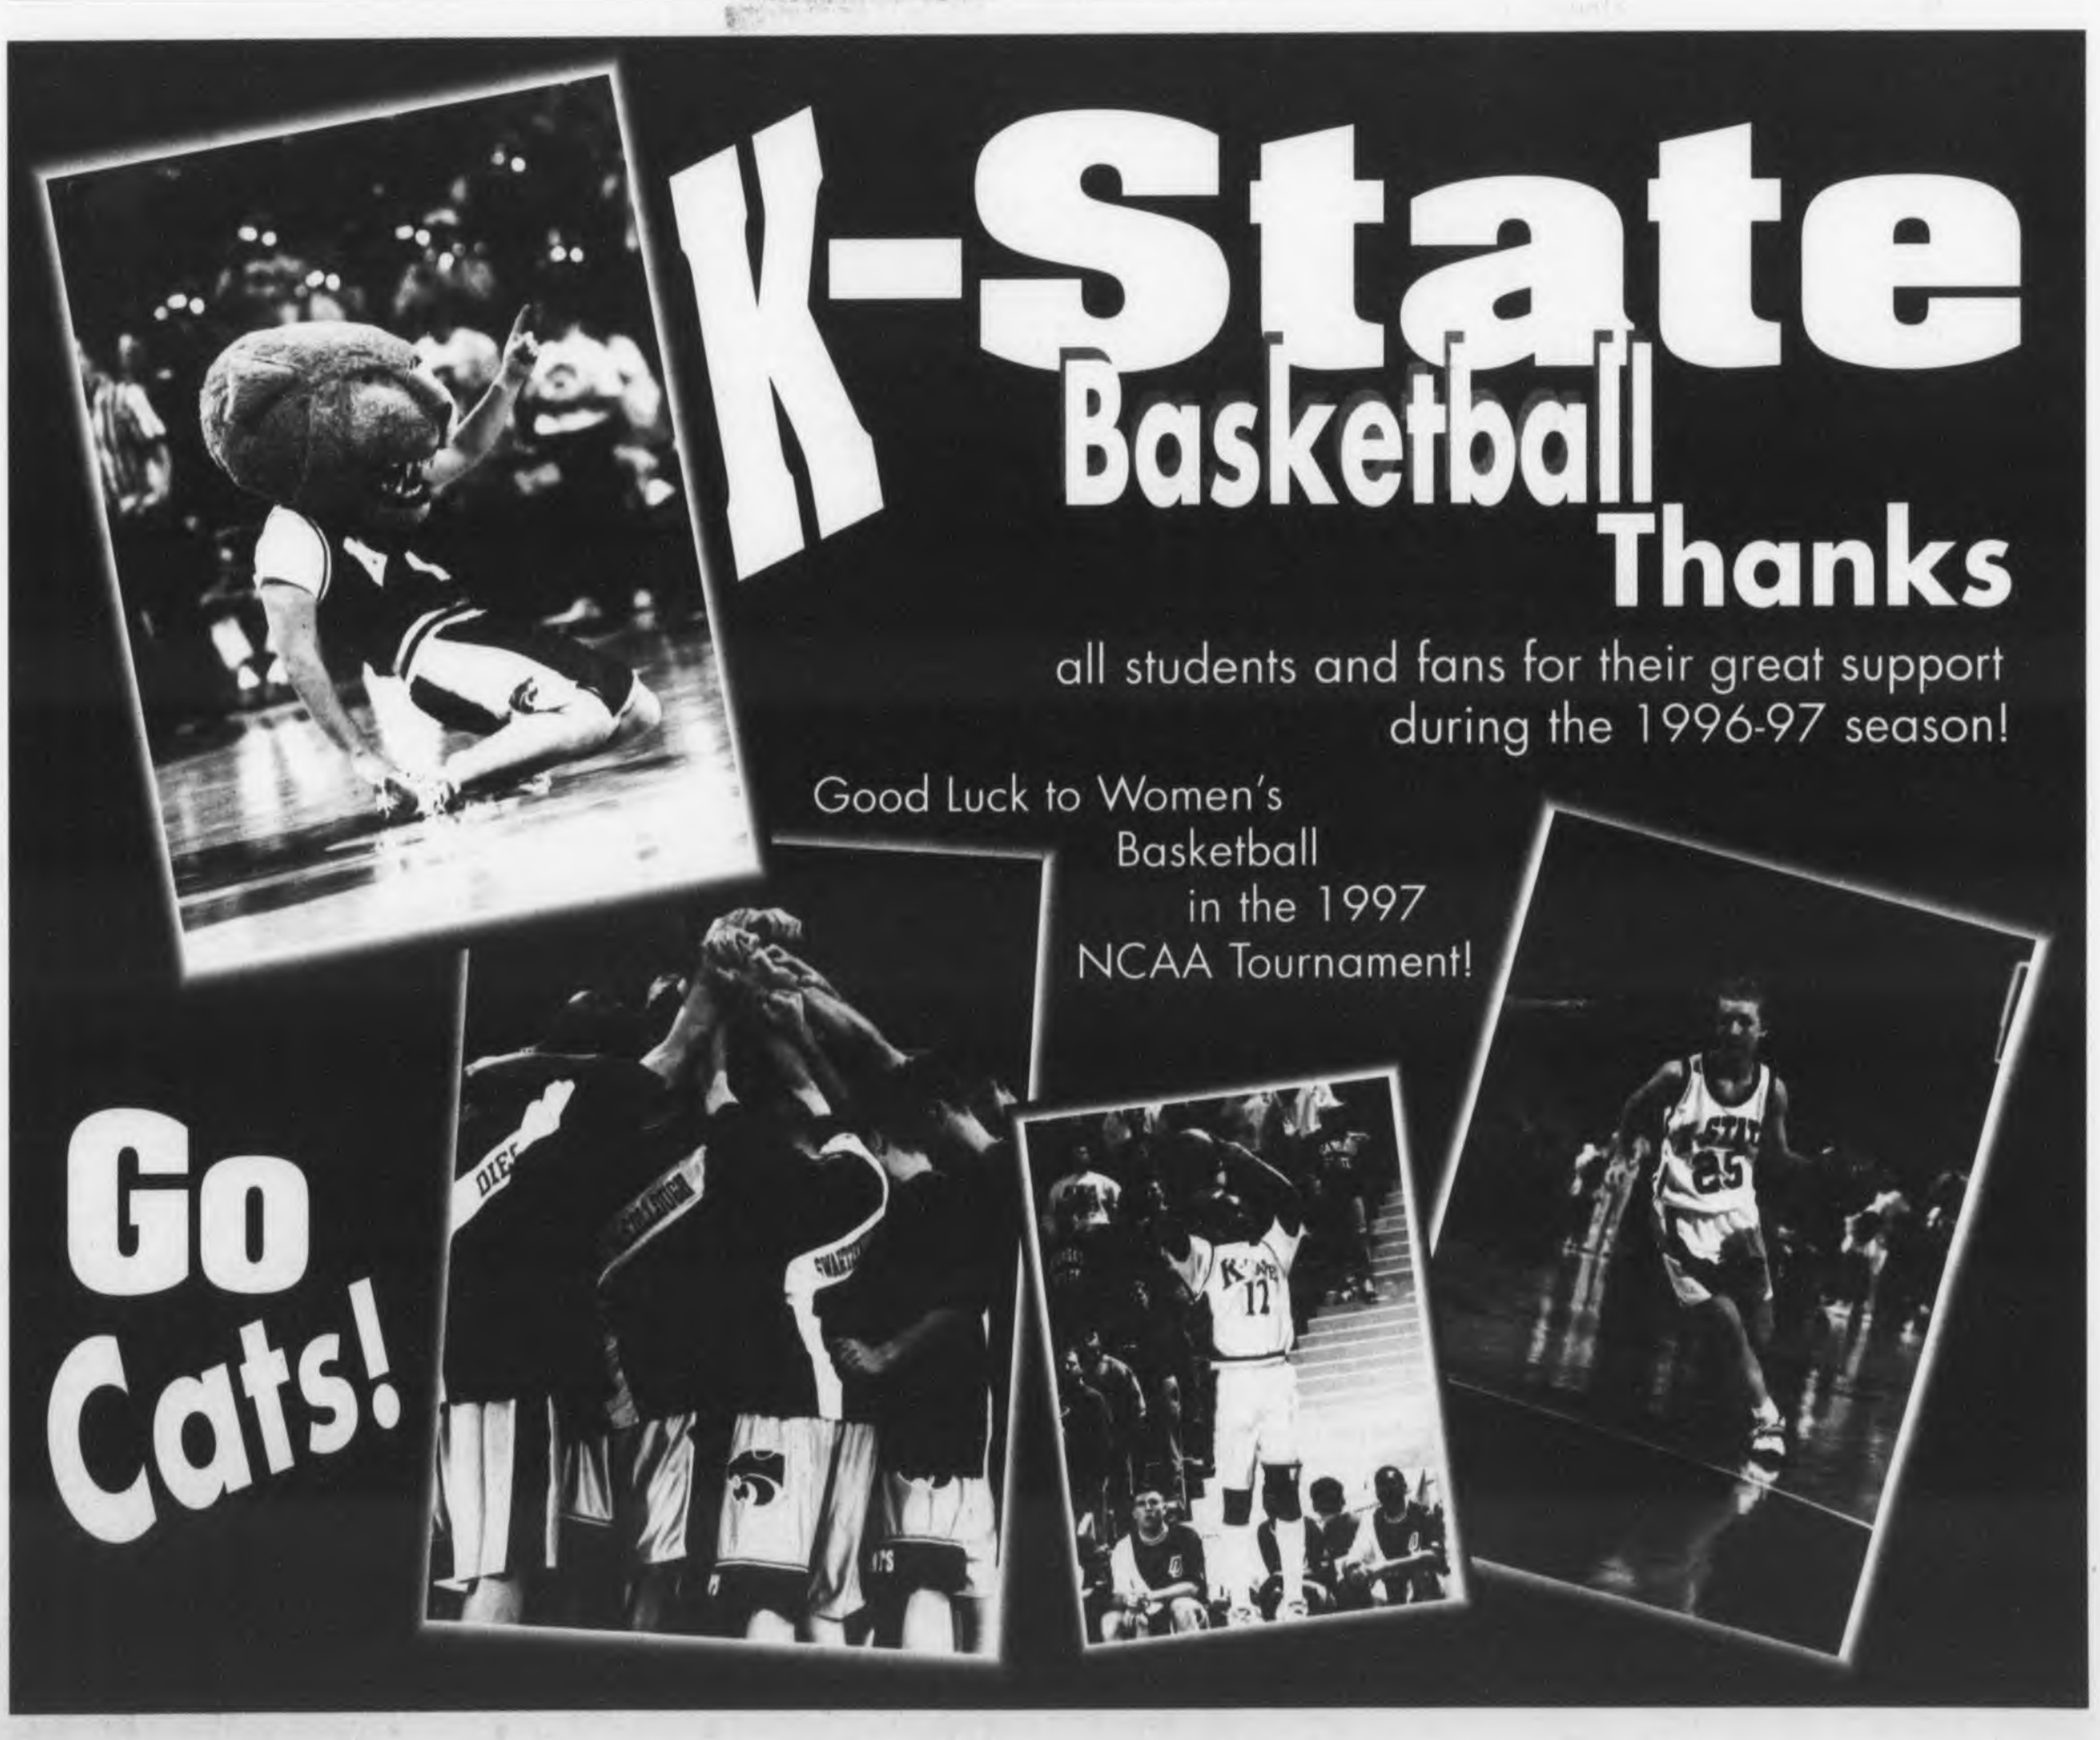
"At least we got more votes than Burns and Miller," Hock said.

He also said he thought they were the best-looking candidates on the ballot.

"I thought we had the cute vote in the bag," Hock said.

Hock said he thought the Flashback Lounge was the perfect place for an announcement party.

"You can't get a better location. If you listen, you can hear them bowling upstairs," Hock said.



Hock said he was glad his supporters spent the evening with them singing karaoke songs from the 1980s.

"Only a drunk Japanese businessman could have invented this," Hock said.

Senator's impeachment proceedings have many inherent flaws

If all is fair in love and war, it sure isn't in campus politics.

After Student Senator Sean Tomb's negative campaign advertisement about student body presidential candidate Aaron Otto appeared in Tuesday's Collegian, several members of Student Governing Association began to advance impeachment proceedings against him.

The catch, and there is always a catch, is the SGA members — including Student Body President Chris Hansen and Student Senate Chair Aubrey Abbott — support Otto's campaign.

The impeachment legislation, which was written by the administration's representative to Senate, will be considered in a special meeting of the Senate Operations Committee tonight, before the legislation's consideration in the Senate meeting to follow.

And who chairs the Operations committee? Sam Halabi, who also happens to support Otto's campaign.

This is almost a textbook example of conflict of interest. These concerned SGA members should do themselves a favor and remove themselves from this process.

The Operations Committee meeting should be canceled in favor of considering the legislation at its regular Monday evening meetings instead of rushing to judgment while members are still overly passionate about the issue. If anything, this isn't fair to Tomb.

But the real icing on the cake of this issue is the disturbing precedent it would set for future impeachment decisions.

As a non-candidate, Tomb's actions are not in violation of any SGA regulation, as even Chair Abbott has said senators' actions outside of Senate are of no concern to SGA.

What sort of message would Tomb's impeachment send to the student body if a perceived wrong-doing, as in Tomb's case, was punishable by impeachment?

Recently, DUI and lewd and lascivious behavior convictions of separate senators in a court of law were not grounds for impeachment. So why should Tomb's case be treated differently, especially when it wasn't an incident involving the law?

If Tomb is impeached, it would mean any elected member of SGA who is considered to have maybe committed a crime would be impeachable.

The truth of the matter is that this impeachment process is fueled by political motivations, pure and simple.

I brake for courtesy

Mutual respect essential for peaceful driver, pedestrian coexistence

VIEWPOINT

JUSTIN WILD

JUSTIN WILD is a senior in English and education. You can your e-mail comments to Justin at (justone@ksu.edu).

Earlier in the semester, I wrote a column regarding K-State's parking garage dilemma. I was against a parking garage, because I think people need to walk more. I also think that, at times, drivers on campus can be quite rude. Recently, though, I noticed something I had overlooked before — rude pedestrians.

My interest in this subject was sparked earlier in the semester, when I saw some students surveying (you know, those gnomes with tripods, metal tape and a stick).

Their metal tape was lying across a roadway on campus, and someone drove over it. One of the members of the team, enraged at such a trespass, let a stream of profanity fly.

Then, on Friday, I saw some students standing on the crosswalk between Anderson and Kedzie halls, chatting the day away. A car came up, the driver tapped his horn as a message for them to get out of the way. True to form, one of the conversationalists flipped him off and then uttered a nice litany of profanity.

Imagine the nerve of that driver, wanting to drive on the street.

Since that incident, I have seen more and more incidences of pedestrians putting their own safety and that of drivers at risk. I wish to bring this to light, not because I'm particularly concerned for the pedestrians, but for the drivers.

If someone doesn't have the common sense to walk on the sidewalk, I couldn't care less if they get a friendly tap from a bumper.

I would hate to see a motorist get into an accident, such as getting rear ended because of a sudden stop or swerving to miss someone who waltzed out into the street because common sense and courtesy was not exercised on the part of a pedestrian.

I question the intelligence that would motivate someone to walk out into traffic, as I have seen dozens of times at an intersection on Denison Avenue that connects the campus to a parking lot. Didn't we all learn our lesson on Sesame Street to look both ways before crossing the street?

Instead of K-State shuttle buses, have we as a campus come to the point where we must have designated adults to hold our hands in order to safely cross the street?

I still believe that an engine and four wheels do not give someone the right to behave recklessly. By that same token, I also don't think that exercising the right to walk gives individuals the right to stop traffic with their bodies.

On both sides of this question, people have to use not only common sense, but also common courtesy. There isn't a single student on this campus who should have the right to disrupt the traffic flow on either the sidewalk or the street because they are in a hurry.

There is not a concrete answer to this question. If the almighty powers that be approved a parking garage tomorrow, drivers would still have to practice caution while looking out for pedestrians sauntering around.

If God himself came down and closed off the streets on campus, this would still exist as a problem on the outskirts of campus.

The solution simply lies in a mutual respect people should have for one another. If you're driving, and a walker seems in a big hurry, stop for 10 seconds, and let the person use the crosswalk.

On the other side of the coin, if a car is flying down the street, don't step in front of it. While walking on campus, use the sidewalk and not the street.

I have always maintained that students at K-State are a community. As a student body and a generation, we have many common bonds.

Instead of arguing about who's wrong and who's right, perhaps we can all use our sense and realize this isn't a question of right or wrong, but a question of respect.

Taking Pride in K-State

Many things might make K-Staters proud to be Wildcats

Each morning I wake up and thank the purple heavens above that I am a K-Stater. My heart would shatter if I lived in Nebraska, Oklahoma or that God-forsaken Lawrence.

It should also go without saying that I would rather poke my eyes out than claim one of those Texas schools. If ya'll or howdy ever roll off my tongue, I want you to beat me upside the head.

But even sometimes in this utopia we call Manhattan, we forget how great we have it. Classes keep us too busy. The weather gets a little boring. Professors are on our case, and our roommates drive us crazy. It is times like these when we need to sit back and realize how lucky we are to have purple running through our veins.

When life has gotten a little bothersome or you just feel like throwing the towel in on those darn classes, it helps to sit back and remember the great things about college, especially K-State.

There is a certain happiness that only K-Staters can feel and share with each other, and maybe it is time to contemplate the wonderful aspects of this elite group. I have compiled a short list of the things that make my heart flutter, my eyes water and my face smile.

- The big purple flag that Willie wrestles out on the football field or basketball court.
- The ominous sunflowers that forever grace the new and improved Farrell Library.
- The smell of fresh bread wafting throughout the K-State Student Union.
- The free T-shirts the cheerleaders sling into the crowd at basketball games.
- Sleeping in the Union before class while ESPN's SportsCenter blares in the background.
- The smell of hamburgers cooking on the many grills of fellow K-Staters who flood the parking lot three hours before a football game to tailgate.
- Seeing the new K-State license plates proudly displayed on cars across the state.
- The swaying grass of the Konza Prairie.
- Yelling "Good For Another Wildcat First Down" while witnessing a stadium-wide wave of purple arms.
- That care-free feeling that sweeps over Manhattan as the last final ends for the semester.
- The KSC on the wrought-iron gates of Memorial Stadium.
- Mark Young throwing an elbow that landed in Jacque Vaughn's mouth.
- The sweet sound of Harley Davidsons in KSU Stadium during Willie's pregame show.
- Knowing that we were not chosen to house Bob Dole's congressional archives.
- The mouth-watering taste of ice cream from Call Hall on a hot afternoon.
- The smell of printing ink seeping out of Kedzie Hall.
- The K-State Singers belting out the national anthem in Bramlage Coliseum.
- The electricity of homecoming and the sound of Ahearn Field House shaking from the excitement within.
- Aggieville.
- The purple caravan to Dallas highlighted by the periodic highway signs that kept us going.
- Boris Yeltsin proudly wearing purple and white halfway around the world.
- Claiming the national victory in Livestock Judging.
- Knowing that Coach Bob Cope will be enjoying another spring in Manhattan.
- Being known around the world for agriculture, engineering, architecture and veterinary science — just to name a few.
- Being away from Manhattan and seeing someone with a K-State sweatshirt or license plate.
- The manual scoreboard at Frank Myers Field.
- Putting K-State on the map with our Debate Championship and knowing that it is undebatable.
- The thumping of the "Cheers" episode that leads into "We Will Rock You."
- Driving over the new bridge and seeing the familiar KS on the side of the hill.
- The elitist feeling you rightfully get when you put on a purple sweatshirt.
- Seeing the signs on Interstate 70 that advertise the greatness of K-State.
- Being able to wave the wheat more than KU fans when our football team obliterated them four years in a row.
- The feeling of accomplishment after working up an honest sweat at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.
- The luring sound of the K-State Marching Band playing "The Wabash Cannonball."
- Walking under the arch of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.
- Making most sportswriters eat their words when the women's basketball team, expected to finish 11th in the Big 12, clawed its way into the NCAA tourney.
- School spirit accentuated by alumni support.
- Everyone singing the words to "Wildcat Victory."
- Drinking a Wet Willie.
- Standing room only in Ahearn in support of our top notch volleyball team.
- The roar of Willie as he drives onto the field, followed by "Let's Get Ready to Rumble."

• CITY COMMISSION ELECTIONS DESERVE STUDENT ATTENTION

Editor,

With presidential and various other elections finally over, and student senate voting nearing a memory, it is important for students to remember another political race that is nearing a decision — the Manhattan City Council elections.

Some may view this election as unimportant to the K-State community — not so. For those of you that didn't already know, on July 3, 1994, the K-State campus became part of the city of Manhattan.

Previously, K-State was a self-sustaining body, nearly unaffected by the city itself. Since the July 3 inclusion of the University into the city, certain issues such as sales tax rates, road improvements and the hopeful development of a city bus system, directly affect the University population.

From the prices we pay at the K-State Student Union to the future of parking here at K-State (an issue so detailed I almost regret bringing it up), our lives will be largely in the hands of the city council members.

The city, itself, needs the voice of the University represented in its decision making more than ever. Since the military downsizing, and its effects on Fort Riley, the financial support provided by the University to the city of Manhattan is more important than ever.

We even have two of our own in the running — the very impressive Mary Nichols, and Karen McCulloh, who is on the rebound from a recent loss in the election for county commission last fall.

Voter registration deadline is March 17, and early voting makes it easy to find the time to vote, so I encourage all students to get registered, get informed and then get out and vote!.

• STUDENTS NEED VOICE IN FEE DECISIONS

Editor,

At last Thursday's Student Senate meeting, a plebiscite was passed to gain the official position of the student body on optional fees. This plebiscite is a non-binding vote, which is to get student input on this important issue.

With the cost of education going up each year, an optional fee system would allow the individual student to decide which programs they support.

Students can decide for themselves if programs are worth supporting and not rely on elitist attitudes of some people in student government to do it for them.

This system is simple. If you use or support a service, you pay the fee. This is not a radical idea, but a real approach to creating a more fair system of fee collection. Optional fees are a way to let students decide if their hard-earned money should go to support programs on this campus.

Unfortunately, while voting this year, you were denied the opportunity to voice your concerns on this issue. The current student body president, Chris Hansen, did not feel the students of this campus were smart enough to understand this issue.

Hansen did not sign this bill, even though Senate passed it overwhelmingly by a 40-1 vote. It is a sad day for democracy when an elected official is afraid of getting input on an issue that would affect every student.

Last year, Hansen campaigned for student government to be more accountable to the student body. When you do not care how students think on an important issue, who are you accountable to?

• COLUMNIST'S PERSPECTIVE MISSES TALENTS OF TEAM

Editor,

Last Monday morning, March 10, I couldn't wait to read about K-State's great showing in the Big 12 tournament in the Collegian. I was especially curious about Todd Stewart's article, "Big 12 Championship Provides New Perspective."

What new perspective did Todd Stewart have now after seeing the women's team play? Was he impressed by their basketball skills, their toughness, a great tournament showing? Well, I learned a couple of things. The team has some good players, but, boy, are they hot! I mean really, really, good looking! The writer had aspirations of dating any one of them — maybe all of them. I can't really be sure.

I had the privilege to serve as a manager for the team during the 1993-'94 season when Kjersten Larson, Andria Jones and Missy Decker were freshman. I competed against them everyday in practice for most of the season. I'll give you my perspective of the women's team. I found them to be mentally and physically tough, very knowledgeable of the game, and, by the way, excellent basketball players. They played through injuries, played when they were physically exhausted and always played hard.

Although I graduated from K-State three years ago, I still follow the team closely over the Internet. Kjersten Larson, AndriaJones, Missy Decker and the entire team have worked very hard and made great strides for K-State women's basketball. They will leave the program better off then when they found it. I can sum up my perspective in one word — winners.

Life goes on

JOHN FARRELL, right, candidate for student body president, shares a laugh with friend Danny Chiles, left, senior in marketing and management, after discovering that he is not next in line for president. Farrell heard the news over a drink at Auntie Mae's Parlor Wednesday evening.

Farrell takes defeat, won't run again

High fives were given and whoops and hollers filled the upstairs of Auntie Mae's Parlor as John Farrell, presidential candidate, learned he had received 146 votes in the student body presidential election.

"This comes as a complete and total shock," Farrell said sarcastically. "But seriously, I think Mark (Moessner) and I were the only candidates with real issues. Now that we got the ball rolling about major issues, I hope that one of the other candidates will pick up where we left off."

Farrell said he did not know if he will support anyone in the run-off election.

"As far as (Tim) Riemann, I'd be willing to talk to him," he said.

As for presidential candidate Aaron Otto, Farrell said he does not support Otto in the re-election campaign.

Mario Brown, junior in political science, said he liked Farrell's campaign.

"I think there are too many turkey whackers getting elected. To quote Rick Flair, 'Whether you like it or you don't like it, you better learn to love it because it's the best going today.' That's how I feel about Farrell," Brown said.

Danny Chiles, senior in marketing and management, and supporter of Farrell, said he demands a recount because he personally knows 153 people who voted for Farrell.

"I think students at K-State didn't look at the true issues in the campaign. That's why Farrell didn't win," Chiles said.

Farrell said he was so disappointed about what happened that he doesn't plan to ever run for student body president again.

But he was in high spirits about an intramural basketball game he had just played at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

"I'd like to use this opportunity to publicly declare myself eligible for the NBA draft," Farrell said.

Balzer to return to normalcy

STORY BY ERICA DUNCAN • PHOTO BY IVAN KOZAR

Adam Balzer, Amy Grieshaber and about six of their supporters waited at the Purple Pig Wednesday night to find out they lost their bid for president and vice president.

Balzer and Grieshaber ran a low-key campaign. They did not do a lot of advertising.

"I didn't like the idea of signs," Balzer said.

Grieshaber said she was an environmentalist.

"I can talk and people can hear me," she said.

Both of the candidates said they were pleased with the coverage given to them by the Collegian.

"The Collegian thought pretty highly of us, and it sounded like people were impressed with our ideas," Balzer said.

They said getting their ideas out to the student body was Balzer and Grieshaber's goal.

"It's not hinged on weather we win or lose, but on the right thing being done," Grieshaber said.

She also said she was happy some of their campaign ideas made it on the ballots.

Brad Phillips, freshman in mass communications, said Balzer and Grieshaber are dedicated to their jobs and school, so they didn't put as much time into their campaign.

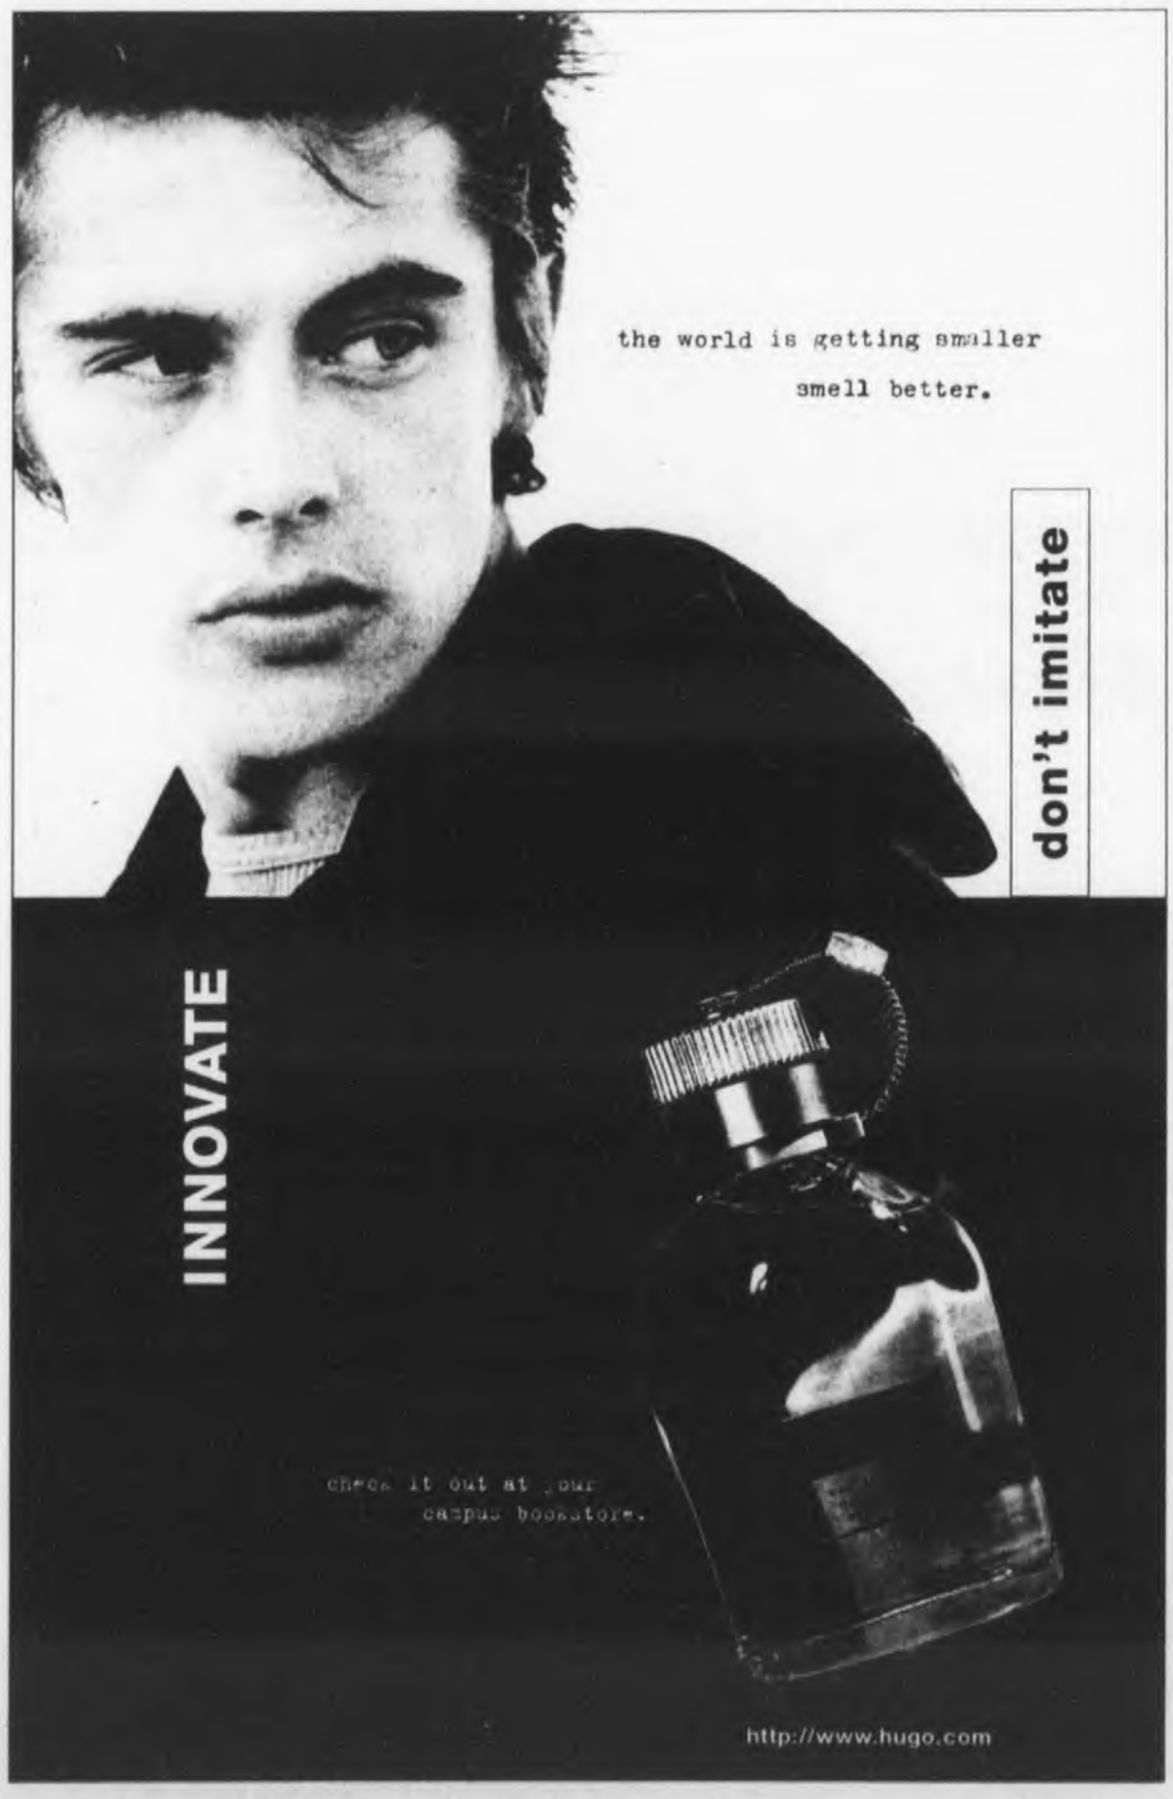
Phillip's main contribution was getting their names out to the students.

"I made sure a lot of people knew they were running," Phillips said.

Shawn Etherton, sophomore in animal science, said he thought Balzer went about the campaign well.

"I liked his ideas. I thought he had a lot of courage to do it."

Now that the elections are over for Balzer and Grieshaber, they said they'll return to their normal lives and try to relax.



"I tried to avoid the political b.s. that goes along with the campaign. Doing that is stressful," Grieshaber said.

Balzer said the campaign was something his parents were happy about.

He also said his grandparents were excited that he and his cousin, Grieshaber, were running.

The studen.'s who voted during this week's election did so because of proposed parking s.ituations, city-wide designated driving or because they knew someone running for an office.

The Collegian's Voters' Guide played an integral role in informing students of candidate's views and campaign platforms.

"I voted for peop le I knew. I looked in the Collegian and read about the others," Katie Teply, freshman undecided, said.

Dan Eshleman, junior in marketing, said there is not nearly enough parking on campus.

"I wouldn't mind an increase in fees if it helped with parking," Eshleman said.

Students also said they voted because they are concerned about University processes in general.

"I care about the way K-State is run. I voted because I know people, and they asked me to," Annie Flagler, freshman in geography, said.

Friendships also influenced the way students voted.

Cindy Waters, senior in family services and human resources, said she voted because she knew a couple of people who were running and knew they would work hard.

She also said looking through the Collegian's Voters' Guide helped make decisions about candidates she did not know.

Some students said they voted solely on issues raised by the candidates.

by the student support. Aaron Otto is a good opponent, and it will be interesting on Wednesday," he said.

Neufeld, junior in agricultural economics, was also pleased with the results.

"We look at the runoff as a positive thing. We think it is important that everyone who voted will vote on Wednesday," she said.

After Riemann and Neufeld found out that they were going to be in a runoff, campaign supporters began to talk about what they wanted to do in the week leading up to the runoff.

"We will try to get the name out as much as possible. We want people to know we are running for them, that is why our main focus is on education," Riemann said.

"The runoff will give students who didn't vote another chance," he said.

OTTO

So when Elections Chair Sean Asbury showed up to deliver the news, Otto stood up on a stool and encouraged the students there to keep up the campaigning until next Wednesday's election.

Shouting above the din of the bar, he reiterated the planks of his platform, answering criticisms others have thrown at him during the election.

Critics have said issues like teacher evaluations are stale and that solutions are already in motion.

Otto said the work he and President Chris Hansen have done to get teacher evaluations published is not finished. The proposal is now being considered by Faculty Senate, and if passed, will require the president's energies for implementation.

"We've worked this last year on this, and it's something we're going to get done," he said. "It's something that's been talked about since 1976, and for the first time, we're doing something about it."

Although issues like evaluations and campus safety were familiar, Otto said they were just as important as the new ideas introduced by other candidates. He said he would rather resolve these projects than change issues for the sake of new ideas.

Otto and Knedlik also answered an opponent's charge that campus safety is not even a priority.

"Everyone rags on campus safety," Knedlik said later. "Campus safety is one of the most positive things to work on. A lot of guys think that's not important. I know as a woman, I think that's very important. If we had the highest crime rate in the Big 12, people wouldn't come here."

Gesturing in the direction of Bill Burns, who had just learned of his defeat, Otto said he would embrace some of the ideas Burns and other presidential candidates had presented, and he planned to meet with Burns in the coming week.

The K-State women's basketball team tips off its first tournament appearance since 1987 Friday. Read tomorrow's Collegian for reports from Alabama.

On ESPN's look at the women's brackets for the NCAA Tournament Tuesday night, sportscaster Mimi Rogers said she spoke with Coach Deb Patterson about her team's upcoming NCAA game. Patterson told her she thought the Cats were not one of the "big dogs," but rather one of the little poodles, nipping at all the big dogs' heels.

When she arrived in April of last year, Patterson had many things to do with no time to waste.

"The first thing you've got to do in the spring is sign four or five new players, and then establish a relationship with the players you've already got on your roster," Patterson said.

DEB PATTERSON, RIGHT, gives Missy Decker instructions during the Wildcats' match up against Colorado in the Big 12 Tournament in Kansas City, Mo.

Junior guard Brit Jacobson, senior forward Andria Jones and senior point guard Missy Decker were all players Patterson said had experienced significant playing time. She added three freshmen last fall: Jacobson's sister, Sunny, center Angie Finkes and forward Nicky Ramage, along with junior walk-on guard Amy Short.

With only 10 scholarship players and just more than half of them posting actual Division I game experience, Patterson said she tried to put their season in perspective.

"As we approached the season in the preseason, before we ever played a game, we were apprehensive and anxious relative to what we'd be able to do with the team," Patterson said. "We totally changed what they'd done in the past, from the way they tied their shoes to the way they run in the gym."

Joining a new coaching staff and learning how to work with them was easy for Patterson, since she had worked with assistant coach Kamie Ethridge at Vanderbilt.

"The staff was adjusting to one another and the University," Patterson said.

The coaches attempted to gather together an outlook on what lay before them, and Patterson said she began her one-day-at-a-time outlook at that point.

"It wasn't realistic to have high expectations at the beginning of the season," Patterson said, talking about the team's background. "It was hard to expect them to have a high level of trust, understandably so, because what reason would they have to trust us?"

Yet another hurdle Patterson had to overcome was getting the monkey of NCAA violations off the team's back.

"We get the opportunity to line up in practice Oct. 15, but can't take advantage of that because of the NCAA violations," Patterson said. "We have to wait until Oct. 20."

Until the team began its season with an important win over an NCAA Tournament team, the Memphis Lady Tigers, Patterson said things were up in the air.

"It's one thing to see a team as they get together in practice, and quite another to see them and how they react in a game situation," she said. "Bridgett, Kamie, Sue and I saw the most encouraging things when we saw this team beat Memphis."

Even though it was early in the season for both teams, Patterson said the coaches knew the Lady Tigers would be in the NCAA Tournament this year.

"A Tournament-tested team walked into our place, and we stood toe-to-toe with them and got a win," Patterson said. "It demonstrated the competitive character that this team has. We lost our first exhibition game, so it would have been easy for them to say, 'Oh, well,' and give up."

Patterson said she felt the tempo of the season was set by that win Nov. 22, although she believes this team will continue to improve in its upcoming game.

"I still think they're evolving," Patterson said. "In the Big 12 Tournament, they were just starting to get comfortable with themselves. They're totally accepting their roles within the system. They couldn't have done that any better than they did last week."

Senior guard Kjersten Larson said a year ago the players were wanting to see the year end, but with Patterson's presence, things quickly turned around.

"We didn't even enjoy the game anymore," Larson said. "This season, you saw smiles on the court, because we were having fun. We've all learned so much that we can carry into our lives. It will only make us stronger."

Patterson said the support from the K-State fans, faculty and community at the Big 12 Tournament was overwhelming.

"When we walked out on the court and the players were being introduced, a wave of emotion came over me that almost brought me to tears," she said. "These fans are unbelievable."

The trip to Tuscaloosa, Ala., is a long one on the road, but Patterson offered an incentive to hard-core Cats fans.

"If we could actually get people to road trip to Alabama, it could seriously put us over the edge," Patterson said. "If anybody does make that road trip, I'll come back and buy each and every one of them dinner, even if I have to buy 500 dinners. And you can put that in print."

Essential ingredients for making the madness throughout March

VIEWPOINT

JON BALMER
JON BALMER is a freshman in pre-journalism and mass communications. You can e-mail your comments to Jon at (jkb2004@ksu.edu).

It has begun.

Today, when the giant Naismith clock in the sky strikes 11, the 16-day basketball festival that is the NCAA Tournament starts its engines. Leaving all other collegiate tourney's in its wake, the properly dubbed "March Madness" is the perfect mix of hellafied hoops and basketball odyssey.

It is a time when grown individuals can affix themselves to polyester couches for mass quantities of life and be excused for their lackadaisical lounging. It is a time when the deafening bombs of Dick Vitale actually become tolerable. Yes, this big time basketball bash is truly a hoopster's paradise.

But what does one do to capture the feeling of Madness and consume it for all it's worth? Let me tell you daddy-O, it's not just watching the contests. Oh no — it extends far beyond this. So if you value college hoops as more than just a barrage of games, here's a helpful heaping of tourney tips that are sure to transform the Big Dance into one swingin' celebration.

Leading off, make sure to establish position. Be it in your friendly living quarters sprawled out on a Lay-Z-Boy or within one of Manhattan's friendly watering holes, locate a spot where the Madness can be viewed for hours on end.

If your pad or a friend's facilities are where it's at, food supply is the next decision. Massive Madness can't be dished out on an empty stomach, so break out the buffalo wings and make sure Pizza Shuttle is on auto-dial.

As for the viewing audience, make sure to surround yourself with knowledgeable cohorts. There's nothing worse than having the tension of a tight game interrupted by the question "Is Danny Manning going to take the last shot?"

When all the pre-stage planning is bagged up, it's time to tackle the tourney itself. To establish yourself on a higher level of fanaticism, bone up on small bits of info that will bedazzle your friends and woo the ladies.

For example, did you know 14th seed St. Mary's has a 7'3" center who weighs more than 330 pounds and goes by the nickname "Big Continent"? Or were you aware tiny Long Island University features the nation's top scoring offense and leading scorer in Charles Jones, who hauls in more than 30 points a game?

If this doesn't knock them upside the head, lay on the KU trivia.

Were you aware that under Roy Williams' leadership, the Jayhawks have never lost in the opening round? Also, KU's opponent, Jackson State, is the alma mater of current Detroit Piston's guard Lindsey Hunter. Hunter once lit up KU for 43 points when the two schools last met. With this kind of trivial trivia at your side, you're sure to be crowned "King of the Sofa."

Once the tourney is under way, you'll most definitely want to catch every contest that tips off. However, due to the fact that the first round features 32 separate match-ups, this may not be possible and should probably be advised against due to health reasons. Nonetheless, there are certain showdowns that are sure to satisfy your soul.

High on your viewing list should be all the David vs. Goliath face-offs, this referring to any of the 14-11 seeds and their higher seeded opponents. Every year there is always one or two squads that cold cock a higher known school out of the tourney (Eastern Michigan and Princeton last season), and 1997 should continue the giant slaying tradition. The East Region looks ripe for this year's upset crop, so keep your sights focused on the midget seeds of March Madness.

Outside of this, the 8 vs. 9 games usually hold the closest contests. The best first round match this season could be Indiana-Colorado. The two teams are very evenly matched, and Bob Knight is always a figure to watch. In the past he's hurled chairs and kicked players, so don't turn away from him until it's all over. Best bet for this year's Knight tirade is a heated wrestling match between the General of Hoosierville and the Buff's mascot following the game. This is a rumble too close to call.

On that note, so ends my listing of Madness mixers. Use them to your advantage throughout the tourney, and remember, it's not Madness unless you live it.

Halogen Lamps

Follow these rules to keep your house safe when using a halogen lamp.

- Do not operate in close proximity to combustible materials.
- Do not touch either the lamp or the reflector while the light is turned on.
- Turn off the power and unplug from the wall outlet before replacing bulb. Make sure bulb has plenty of time to cool down.
- Do not subject lamp to shock when it is on because the bulb can shatter.
- Use a 300-watt bulb in the lamp.
- Place in a corner, away from foot traffic to reduce the chance of knocking the lamp over.

Halogen lamps deemed safe

JASON ELLIS
staff reporter

Halogen lamps, although trendy, have been taking a bad wrap as being hazardous, unsafe fire starters.

"The hazard is not in the halogen, but in the wattage of the bulb," Jason Endacott, sales manager of Endacott Lighting, said.

"Any bulb, halogen or incandescent, that is 300 or 500 watts can start a fire."

Halogen lights produce more heat than what consumers are used to, Endacott said.

Owners of lights originally manufactured with 500-watt bulbs are being urged to replace them with 300-watt bulbs, Endacott said.

The decrease in size affects the amount of light, but will keep from burning out the lamp fixture. The use of a 500-watt bulb in a lamp designed for a 300-watt bulb will ruin the lamp within six months, he said.

There is no hazard or safety problem with the lamps, Chuck Tannehill, Manhattan fire department's assistant director of technical services, said.

Some changes have been made in the design, enhancing the safety features. What makes these lamps unsafe is homeowner negligence, he said.

The original designs featured a metal screen as a shield over the 500-watt bulb, Endacott said.

Manufacturers switched to a clear glass UV-light shield and only use 300-watt bulbs. A modified design provides a larger base, making newer lamps sturdier than earlier ones.

The major problem with the lamps, Endacott said, is consumer awareness.

These lights, which are at least three times as powerful as regular incandescent lights, put off more heat.

A normal incandescent lamp can have curtains laying across them without stating a fire, but not the high-wattage halogen lamps.

In Manhattan, halogen lamps have only started one fire that was reported to the fire department, Tannehill said. That fire was a result of misuse by the owner.

"The fire started by a lamp was last October at Halloween," Endacott said.

"The lamp was used to illuminate a plastic pumpkin placed on top of the lamp."

The smaller halogen desk lamps are of no greater risk than current lights, Endacott said.

The bulbs used in them are usually 50 watts, enough to burn a hand, but not enough to start a fire if contact were made with material, such as curtains or carpet.

Blaring noise stifles study time

TRISHA LANGFORD
staff reporter

With mid-terms approaching, studying is a must. But loud noises blaring through the walls of an adjacent apartment can break a person's concentration.

Article five of the Manhattan Codes states unnecessary noise is an offense against public peace if it is found to be loud and disturbing.

"I have a problem with persistent, loud music from our neighbors. It starts in the afternoon and continues until late at night," Hope Encinias, junior in kinesiology, said.

According to the codes, operation of a machine or device in a manner that is too loud is prohibited between the hours of 11 p.m. and 7 a.m.

Cat Dawson, leasing assistant at McCullough Development, said there are critical hours when stereos, televisions and voices should be kept down.

"You should be aware of your noise at all times, but especially during the critical times," Dawson said.

Being aware of the habits of others is an important tip, according to Dawson.

"Everyone is on a different schedule. You should always be aware of the people around you. You could be disturbing anyone," Dawson said.

Dawson said if a problem with noise occurs, it should not be handled by the individual. Instead, a report to the property manager should be made.

"Never take a problem upon yourself. This could cause a conflict between you and your neighbor and create a bad situation, altercation or unhappy confrontation," Dawson said.

Tenants are more likely to respond aggressively to neighbors, Dawson said. If a phone call or letter is received from the apartment manager, a better reaction occurs.

"I attempted a nice, friendly confrontation in a joking manner," Encinias said.

"But it hasn't helped because you can still hear the base thumping through the walls."

The first and second time a complaint is filed, a letter is sent to the conflicting tenant. If it continues, the situation is taken up personally by the manager with a phone call letting them know that an appointment needs to be scheduled.

"Most times just making them aware will take care of the situation. Many don't even know they're doing it," Dawson said.

If tenants know in advance that people are coming over, Dawson suggests letting neighbors know of the situation.

"If you say 'Let me know if we get too loud and bother you. I will handle it,' then there is less of a problem," Dawson said.

THREE-YEAR-OLD KOLYN HILL entertains himself with Tobi West's props as she delivers her short story to a room full of pre-school children from the KSU Child Development Center Wednesday in Nichols Hall. Mary Nichols' Storytelling class was performing short stories for the children.

TYLER BYLKAS, 5, listens intently to a short story during a presentation from Mary Nichols' Storytelling class Wednesday morning in Nichols Hall.

The Storytellers

Students use class trip to learn art of telling tales

STORY BY KIM BRUHA ■ PHOTOS BY STEVE HEBERT

Telling a story.

Mary Nichols has been teaching people how to do this for 20 years as an instructor at K-State in the Department of Speech.

Nichols teaches Storytelling. The class enables students to learn different techniques for telling stories, such as voice control and gestures. Nichols also has students research age groups they are interested in and give a presentation to local schools on various subjects including friendship, morals and giving.

Each semester Nichols gives her students an opportunity to read to preschool-aged children from the KSU Child Development Center. This enables them to read stories to children, not just their classmates.

"I try to make this a real-life experience for them," Nichols said. "After they are through with the class, they can perform for any age group."

While Nichols said this is a different class compared to others at K-State, she said that most students enjoy it.

"I tell my students that if I get them through the second day of class, they'll make it," Nichols said.

Tara Naegele, freshman in secondary education, said she heard about this class from friends.

"Everybody told me that this is a different class than what you're used to, and it is different," Naegele said. "But I like it a lot."

Melody Harcrow, lead preschool teacher at the center, said by bringing in the kids, it helps make it a more realistic experience for the students.

"The kids' reactions aren't like what their fellow students' will be," she said.

Vogel said the experience also exposes the children to some stories they might never have heard before.

"This is also a wonderful experience for our children, and they love it."

The preschoolers were not the only ones who learned from this experience. Lamar Chapman, sophomore in social science, said bringing in children was a good idea.

"I thought it was a good experience," Chapman said. "I have a little kid back home, so it was fun to see how these kids reacted."

Allison Vogel, senior in kinesiology, acted out a story for the children and encouraged them to participate.

"It was neat to get their involvement and see their faces lit up when you read to them," Vogel said.

Whatever her students get out of the class, Nichols said her approach to teaching enables them to learn in a different way.

"My students learn more than they could ever find out reading a text book."

Playboy says McVeigh confesses

McVeigh

▶ Look it up on the World Wide Web. Want to read what Playboy Magazine had to say? Point your Web browser at (http://www.playboy.com/mcveigh/index.html).

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — Timothy McVeigh told his attorneys the force of a bomb he set off in Oklahoma City in 1995 pushed him against the wall of a nearby building as he made his escape, Playboy Magazine has reported.

McVeigh also said he encountered a mail carrier who looked at him and said, "Man, for a second, I thought that was us who blew up," the magazine reported in a story posted on its Internet site Tuesday.

McVeigh replied, "Yeah, so did I," the magazine stated.

Playboy said the story was based on lawfully obtained documents prepared for the defense that were obtained last spring, but did not explain the delay in reporting on the documents.

The Playboy story is the second to move on the Internet in the past two weeks that says McVeigh confessed to his lawyers. The Dallas Morning News reported on its Web site Feb. 28 that McVeigh told his defense team he attacked during the day to ensure a body count.

In a statement released Tuesday night, McVeigh's attorneys said, "These escalating reports of alleged statements by Mr. McVeigh are corrupting the heart of the jury system. The American ideals of justice are being held hostage to sensationalism."

McVeigh's attorney, Stephen Jones, initially claimed the Dallas Morning News' story was a hoax, but four days later said the statement had been faked by the defense team to persuade someone else suspected of being involved in the bombing to talk to defense investigators.

Jones also accused the newspaper of stealing the false confession and hundreds of other files from his computer. The newspaper denied the allegation, and said it used lawful techniques to obtain the documents that were the basis for its story.

Playboy said the documents it used were different than those used by the Dallas newspaper, "yet appear to corroborate basic facts in the News story."

McVeigh and co-defendant Terry Nichols are charged with murder, conspiracy and weapons-related counts in the bombing, which killed 168 people and injured more than 500 others. Nichols will be tried after McVeigh, but a date has not been set.

Playboy's story is a narrative of McVeigh's actions the day of the bombing, with the disclaimer that its version "contains discrepancies with other published accounts of the bombing."

"In cases where there was insufficient, inconclusive or contradictory information, we have relied on the documents," the magazine said.

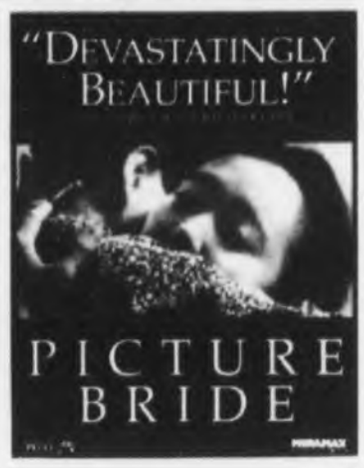
According to Playboy, McVeigh told his lawyers he left the bomb in a rental truck in front of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building April 19, 1995, and walked to an alley behind the YMCA to the parking lot where he had stashed a getaway car.

"McVeigh says he was about 20 feet behind the YMCA on Robinson, almost to the parking lot, when the bomb went off at 9:02 a.m. The explosion threw him against the wall of the building," the magazine said.

Indian statue finds its home at Statehouse

BRANDI HERTIG
staff writer

TOPEKA —Throughout nearly 10 years of waiting and struggle, a 20-foot Kansa Indian is finally on the way to his permanent home: the top of the Statehouse.



Gov. Bill Graves opened a $1 million fundraising drive Wednesday to put the statue on top of the Statehouse.

Richard Bergen, a Salina sculptor, won the Kansas Capitol Dome Sculpture contest in 1988 with his piece, "Ad Astra," a Kansa Indian pointing his bow and arrow toward the North Star. Bergen is a K-State graduate and the father of associate professor of mass communications Lori Bergen.

Students can still save money while in school

STORY BY KARA LOWE • ILLUSTRATION BY ADRIAN FLEMING

Students do not have to keep their money underneath their mattresses or in coin jars. There are ways for students to save money during college and stay on budget.

Small amounts, as well as large amounts, can accumulate interest and make money.

"The easiest way to make a high rate of return without a lot of risk is to pay off credit card bills in full monthly," Jack Cooney, assistant professor of finance, said.

According to Cooney, paying off a credit card saves interest expense up to 20 percent per year.

For example, if someone has $1,000 and the option to put it into a savings account or pay off their credit card, they would save more if they paid off the credit card.

"This is because savings accounts typically only gain about 2 percent interest per year and credit cards have an interest charge up to 20 percent annually," Cooney said.

"Therefore, you would save more by not having to pay the interest charge on the credit card than by gaining the 2 percent interest with a savings account, and having to pay the interest charge on a credit card as well," Cooney said. "If the individual can afford to pay off the credit card every month, it is the best way to save money."

However, savings accounts are very flexible and can help save money.

"If a student has the extra money to put into a savings account monthly or weekly, they have the ability to use the money when its needed," Judy Crosby, assistant vice-president of Security National Bank of Manhattan, said.

Another way to save money is by opening a certificate of deposit. This requires a minimum deposit of $500 rather than the $100 required for a savings account.

"A lot of students open a CD after they get their student loan," Crosby said.

However, since a CD has to mature the money cannot be drawn out for a designated length of time. With a CD, students do not have the flexibility of taking money out whenever they want to.

"The advantage to CDs is that they have a higher interest rate than savings accounts," Cooney said.

He also said that individuals also run less risk of losing interest with a CD because the money is in the bank longer and it can not be withdrawn frequently.

Other ways to save money are with money market accounts that also require minimum balance. This limits some students' ability to open one, and stocks and bonds where the individual has a higher risk to lose money.

"Typically, the higher rate of return, the higher the risk. Bank investments are insured up to $100,000, which protects against loss," Cooney said. "Other types of investments, like the stock market, are not as safe."

Gretchen Cole, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine, said she saves money with a savings account.

"I try to work all summer and put the money into my savings so I am able to use the money whenever I need it during the school year," Cole said. "This is the easiest way for me to save money."

INCRIMINATING FINGERPRINTS

Police in Allentown, Pa., discovered in September that a man who was recently arrested at the bus station with 280 small bags of heroin in his luggage had chewed off the skin of seven fingertips after being jailed. Said a police sergeant, "It certainly is a strong indication that somebody somewhere is looking for him."

ARMED AND DANGEROUS

A man robbed a variety store in Guelph, Ontario, in December wielding only a three-foot-long tree branch. And in Columbia, Mo., in December, Eric O. Criss, 31, fortified only with a socket wrench, failed in his alleged attempt to rob a grocery store. And in Calgary, Alberta, in December, a man brandishing only a bottle of household cleaner robbed a Bank of Nova Scotia.

Students in dietetics prepare for real world

STORY BY CORY MORGAN • PHOTO BY STEVE HEBERT

ERIN FLOCK, senior in dietetics, inventories food in the freezer storage at Smurthwaite Scholarship/Leadership House. Flock's main duties include maintaining an inventory, ordering food and occasionally training a new house member to cook.

Ordering bulk quantities of food and interviewing patients are everyday activities and part of the requirements for senior dietetic students Lisa Spurgeon and Erin Flock.

Classes do not always revolve around the classroom.

The department of hotel, restaurant, institutional management and dietetics in the College of Human Ecology requires two internships to graduate. Spurgeon, Flock and others use these requirements for real-world experience.

Deborah Canter, professor and program director for the department, said one internship in food service management and one internship in clinical and community nutrition are required.

Currently, 21 students are involved with their first-semester internships, and 14 students are participating in their second-semester internships.

"It's probably one of the most important parts of our school," Canter said. "Students get to experience real-world situations during their internships plus a quality education, all in one package."

Each student has about 900 hours of practical experience by the time they graduate, Canter said.

Internships vary in sites and duties.

For the first semester, the internship requires work in food service management. Sites include Smurthwaite Scholarship/Leadership House, Derby Food Center, the K-State Student Union and various school districts, such as Garden City, Goddard and Shawnee Mission.

"The neat thing about the internships is that students can access the lecture notes for the class through the Internet," Canter said.

Flock is in the middle of her first-semester internship at Smurthwaite.

Her main duties include ordering the food and occasionally training a new member to cook. She also writes production sheets, which explain how to prepare each dish, including the amount of time needed to complete the recipe.

Flock said the internship has helped her prepare for the future.

"This internship has given me good hands-on experience and has taught me to work with different types of people," she said.

Flock usually works about 30 hours each week. She said that K-State's dietetics classes offered her a general background of information.

"The classes I took at K-State helped me understand the basics of dietetics," Flock said. "When you start something new, you don't know what to expect. Some aspects of the job require more responsibility than I thought they would."

The second-semester internship sites for clinical and community nutrition include hospitals around the areas of Kansas City, Topeka and Leavenworth.

Spurgeon is completing her second-semester internship at the Dwight D. Eisenhower V.A. Medical Center in Leavenworth. She has been there since January and said she likes what she does.

"I didn't think that I would get to do this much work on my own," Spurgeon said.

"I think that this internship is probably more than what I expected."

Spurgeon said her internship is preparing her to be a clinical dietitian. She interviews patients and assesses their status and health risks.

She said she mainly works with older men who have problems with alcoholism and high cholesterol.

As for her education at K-State, she said that it really helped her prepare her for this internship.

She said one class, Counseling Strategies in Dietetics, helped her learn how to interview patients and to figure out their problems.

After finding out the problem, she modifies the patient's diet.

Other classes that have helped Spurgeon were Clinical Nutrition and Nutrient Metabolism.

"It is very beneficial to have had a variety of classes in all areas of nutrition and health care," Spurgeon said.

Columbian Gallery

Art history has seen many artist couples throughout the years.

Take the relationship of Alfred Stieglitz and Georgia O'Keeffe (now at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art). The two were prolific artists who shared much, but did they also share an artistic inspiration?

The question of influence between husband and wife artists is answered sensitively and with much interest in the show "Shared Space, Shared Vision," at the Columbian Gallery in Wamego until April 27.

The show explores the artistic relationship of four Kansas couples. The excellent installation offers artist statements that answer questions of process, inspiration and relationship.

It includes Barbara Terrell and Elliot Pujol of Manhattan; Larry Peters and Barbara Waterman-Peters of Topeka; Roger Shimomura and Janet Davidson-Hues of Lawrence; and Robert and Judith Brawley of Lawrence.

Terrell and Pujol collaborated on "Fish Screen," an ornate, metal screen that incorporates a variety of colorful, stylized fish. The piece incorporates a range of materials, from bronze, brass and copper to enamel and amethyst cabochon.

The screen is a fusion of Terrell's exquisite work in jewelry and Pujol's sculptural explorations in various metals.

Terrell said she and her husband approached the show with as much humor as possible.

"Our aesthetics are very close," Terrell said.

Terrell said she and Pujol built a house together two years ago and felt it was time to collaborate once again, this time on the screen.

In the construction of the screen, Terrell said she and Pujol gravitated to those things they each knew the most about.

So, it follows the larger construction of the frame was Pujol's work and the more meticulous fish were contributed by Terrell.

Although each artist couple has their own distinct vision, similarities in the work abound.

Shimomura's contemporary pop art with an Asian influence, as in his "Untitled" series of serigraphs, are mirrored in Davidson-Hues' pop art concern for the identity of women in her work "Color Me Janet," acrylic on canvas.

In this couple's case, it is Shimomura's work that is most widely known and respected.

The Brawley's exhibit some photo-realist drawings, Robert's being some entrancing figure drawings and Judith's following in a tradition of botanical prints.

Although Robert works in other media, he chose to show drawings as a way to reinforce a connection with his wife's work.

The show was organized at the Columbian by Margaret Buie, education and gallery coordinator.

Buie said she didn't have much of a hand in choosing the works, only that she told the artists how much space they would be given and that they would be kept together as a unit.

The Columbian is open 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Saturday and 1 to 5 p.m. Sunday. Admission is free. Call 1-800-899-1893 for more information.

Manhattan Center for the Arts

A new show at the Manhattan Center for the Arts gives one the chance to peak inside three artist-architects' visual travel diaries.

"Workbook," photographic sketches of Italy by Robert Arens, and "People/Places," watercolors and drawings by James Jones and Michael McNamara, are in the A and B Galleries until March 28.

Arens' work was exhibited in Seaton Hall's Chang Gallery last semester and is reproduced similarly in the MCA show. Arens' photographs were taken during a student study-abroad experience he coordinated in Italy last year.

The work of Jones, who began working as an artist before pursuing architecture, is heavily dependent on line, to give definition to the delicate patches of watercolors of Arizona, Italy, Turkey and the Caribbean.

The horizontality of a work like Jones' "Mesa Blue," coupled with its stylized grass and brush, concerns itself more with shapes, tones and forms than with a realistic depiction of a favorable sight.

"The challenge artistically is to capture something of that place," Jones said.

He chooses to work from sketches or memory in order to keep from getting caught up in the details of a place.

Jones said the work of both he and McNamara in this show is more conservative than their more abstract work.

McNamara's work is drawn from several visits to Greece and nearly all of them display some sort of narrative quality, such as the delicate "Weavers, Skyros."

MCA is open 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday or by appointment. Call 537-4420 for more information.

Kemper Museum of Contemporary Art and Design

"An American Premiere: Chihuly Over Venice" is at the Kemper Museum of Contemporary Art, 4420 Warwick Blvd., in Kansas City, Mo., until Sunday.

The show features work by Dale Chihuly, the prominent glass-blowing artist whose orange chandelier is featured in the Beach art museum. The show is work Chihuly hung under bridges and in various architectural settings in Venice, Italy.

Having studied under glass blowing masters in Italy, Chihuly brought his knowledge home to his native Washington State where he has revolutionized glass blowing since the late 1960s.

The large, constructed pieces — fancifully colorful and inspiring — don't so much overwhelm as they entrance.

Although some of the pieces suffer from poor lighting, the exhibit is a worthwhile (though you better hurry) pursuit for those enamored by the Beach's Chihuly.

The Kemper is open 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Tuesday and Thursday, 10 a.m. to 10 p.m. Friday, 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday and 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. Sunday. Call 816-753-5784 for more information.

SCULPTURE

Kansas," Graves said.

The Legislature authorized the placing of a statue on the Statehouse in 1984. "Ad Astra" was supposed to be installed April 4, 1990, with a dedication to follow on July 4. Neither of these events came to pass.

The project has been stalled for years because of money problems. The enabling legislation specified that the organizers seek support solely from private sources.

At least seven efforts to place a statue on the dome have failed. Former Gov. Mike Hayden once described the efforts as a bit of unfinished business throughout Kansas history.

Graves praised Bergen as someone who understands what perseverance is to see the project through.

Bergen plans to install a quarter-size, bronze model of the statue on the Capitol grounds. Bricks can be purchased on which people can have their names or personal message imprinted, with the proceeds going to fund modifications of the dome and getting the actual statue to the top of the Statehouse. The bricks will be laid in the area around the sculpture.

There are also bronze plaques available upon which people can have their names or a company's name engraved.

"It's going to be a tremendous tourist attraction," Bergen said.

Graves donated $1,000 to the drive and Sen. Ben Vidricksen, R-Salina, donated $500.

"We're going to end a decades-long debate over what should be placed on this dome," Graves said.

The fundraising effort will try to raise about $1 million. Nearing the century mark in age, the capitol dome will have to undergo modifications before it the sculpture can be placed on it. Bergen predicts the statue will weigh close to 3,000 pounds.

About $100,000 has already been raised, including several donations of $10,000, Bergen said.

The current Statehouse adornment is a 1,000-watt light bulb.

"One of the finishing touches is to put this beautiful sculpture on the dome," Graves said.

Pay raise may be in sight for legislators

▶ Look it up on the World Wide Web. Want to know more about this legislation? Check out the government Website at (http://www.ink.org/public/legislative/fulltext-bill.html).

▶ PLAN WOULD RAISE most lawmakers' salaries from $18,596 to $35,697.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — It came in the afternoon, and some cynics called it the legislators' self-assisted suicide plan, but a proposal to increase salaries was the talk of the Statehouse on Thursday, not abortion or the suspension of tax debates.

Legislators would receive full-time compensation for their part-time political jobs under a proposal introduced by House leaders.

The Calendar and Printing Committee — whose members include the speaker, majority leader and minority leader — agreed to sponsor a bill that would nearly double compensation for legislators.

Most legislators would see their annual pay increase from $18,596 to $35,697, with leaders receiving additional stipends. The figure includes money legislators receive to cover living expenses and out-of-session office expenses.

The proposal would add at least $2.8 million to the Legislature's annual budget.

House leaders included in the proposal a ban on gifts, including meals, drinks and snacks, from lobbyists to legislators, in hopes of making the pay raise more palatable.

Speaker Tim Shallenburger, R-Baxter Springs, offered the proposal to increase legislative pay as the House Appropriations Committee considered a proposal to strip pay raises for other government employees from the state budget.

"Treat us gently," Shallenburger told reporters after the committee's action.

Let's take a closer look at the salaries

- CURRENT: $18,596
  Salary of $66.63 each day of the 90 days the Legislature is in session, a total of $5,996.70.
  Expense payment of $80 each day of the session, for a total of $7,200.
  Off-session expense allowance of $600, for a total of $5,400.
- HOUSE PLAN: $35,697
  Salary of $166.63 each day of the session, an increase of $100 per day, a total of $14,997.
  Expense payment of $80 each day of the session, for a total of $7,200.
  Off-session expense allowance of $675 every two weeks, for a total of $13,500. The payment comes to $1,500 a month, an increase of $900 a month.

Student Senate fails to override presidential veto

▶ SEAN TOMB, arts and sciences senator, will not face impeachment.

BENJAMIN YODER
staff reporter

Student Senate failed to pass a motion to override a presidential veto Thursday.

Senate also announced it was not necessary to advance impeachment proceedings on Arts and Sciences Senator Sean Tomb because he did not act in a manner unbecoming a senator according to election rules.

Tomb purchased an advertisement in the Collegian about Aaron Otto, candidate for student body president. The Senate Operations Committee met before Thursday night's Senate meeting to discuss Tomb's actions. The committee decided it did not have grounds to take action. Aubrey Abbott, Senate chair, said she spoke to an attorney about the issue, and she was advised to not proceed with the impeachment process.

Senate's regular agenda was interrupted to discuss a presidential veto signed Thursday.

Student Body President Chris Hansen vetoed a resolution that would have added a plebiscite about optional fees on the student body elections.

Optional fees would allow students to decide which fees they would like to pay. The fee system could have increased the cost of people who wanted to pay for the fees and decreased services, according to the resolution.

> We don't decide on these fees. What are we going to do with 5 percent of the student body's opinion? The apathy on this campus is pathetic.

Latina publisher speaks about 1st U.S. magazine for Hispanic women

JOHN HENDERSON
staff reporter

Christy Haubegger said she did not know any better when she decided, right out of law school, to start a magazine for Hispanic women.

"I had been thinking about it for a long time," Haubegger said, "and just thought someone should do it, but probably not me, maybe someone else."

Haubegger did it herself. She's now publisher and president of Latina, the first magazine published in the United States whose target audience is Hispanic women.

Haubegger spoke Wednesday night in Union Forum Hall. The Union Program Council Multicultural Committee sponsored the lecture.

Haubegger said she loves her work and urged the audience to find something to feel passionate about.

"If you feel passionate about something, it's easy to get up in the morning," she said. "Find your passion, and you'll succeed. You'll succeed in a big way."

Latina began in May 1996 with bimonthly issues, and now has an initial paid subscription level of 300,000. Its articles are written in both Spanish and English.

At the end of this semester, a musical director will retire after 27 years of working with the KSU Opera Theater. For him, 'Die Fledermaus' will be his final

CURTAIN CALL

JERRY LANGENKAMP in a photo from the 1975 production of "Die Fledermaus."

STORY BY CLAUDETTE RILEY

A few hours after the sun sets Saturday night, Jerry Langenkamp, professor of music, will applaud the performances of his student singers, take a bow and listen as the curtain closes on his 27 years at K-State.

The three-night production of "Die Fledermaus" commemorates the 27th and final KSU Theater production under his direction.

In one interesting way, Langenkamp's work on Johann Strauss' operetta is the completion of a circle that started nearly a quarter century ago.

In 1975, Langenkamp filled the shoes of an ill student in an otherwise all-student production of "Die Fledermaus" to honor President McCain on his retirement.

Performing in the earlier production marked a departure for Langenkamp, who said he prefers to cast students in productions to give them hands-on experience.

"My philosophy is that every student in our department ought to be able to do a good job or they shouldn't be here," he said.

The confidence Langenkamp has in his students derives from his desire for each to reach his or her individual potential.

"The daily challenge is teaching voice. Each week you are at your post doing drill work, working with scale and talking about making the voice sound good," he said.

"The study of voice is so personal because it's not objective. We don't know what we sound like, and so we are at the mercy of other ears. As a teacher, I am working as much with attitude and psychology as with scale," Langenkamp said.

By working with vocalists through recitals, opera productions and individual weekly lessons in his office, Langenkamp is able to help students find their own dreams.

"I think you have to look inside yourself. If you are not willing to walk over hot coals for applause from the audience, perhaps you ought to look at another aspect of this business," Langenkamp said.

Leaning back in his office chair with his eyes twinkling, Langenkamp points to walls full of memorabilia and posters from national touring companies showcasing former students.

"I have a mature thinking and acting group of students to work with, and then to see them go on to their graduate programs and proceed with great success is a source of enormous gratification," he said.

Success and the hunger of a young performer is something the tenor understands first-hand. Determined to find fortune, he and his wife Kay set off for New York City with $400 in the bank and a baby in the back seat.

Fortune was on Langenkamp's side, and he became a professional chorister with the Robert Shaw Chorale, which was included on multiple recordings and toured nationally.

After contracting a serious nerve infection in 1959, Langenkamp returned to education, first as a student and then an instructor. He has a bachelor's degree from University of Oklahoma and his master and doctoral degrees from the University of Michigan.

Education allowed him to expand his personal horizons and experiment with different aspects of music. He taught at Furman University in Greenville, S.C., before accepting a position at K-State in 1970.

At K-State, Langenkamp became chairman of the Voice Division and director of the opera theater. A full professor since 1983, he said his success

• SUSPECT IN COSBY SLAYING IS SAID TO HAVE RUSSIAN MOB CONNECTIONS

LOS ANGELES — A man who was said to be tied to a Russian car theft ring was arrested in the roadside slaying of Bill Cosby's son after a tipster went to the National Enquirer in hopes of claiming a $100,000 reward.

Police refused to comment on any Russian connection, saying only that they had seized evidence tying the suspect to the Jan. 16 slaying of Ennis Cosby, who was shot as he changed a tire on his $130,000 Mercedes convertible.

But the supermarket tabloid said the key to Wednesday's arrest may have been a call from a tipster who said "a Russian gang member was involved."

The identity of the suspect was not immediately released. A man and a woman were also taken in for questioning.

"We got a call on our Cosby-reward tip line in January, within days of the killing," Enquirer editor Steve Coz said Thursday. "Normally it would have sounded like some nut — the Russian mob? But this guy sounded so credible, we began to pursue it."

He said the tipster provided an Enquirer reporter with a pager number and told the tabloid "his friend heard point-blank that he heard a Russian gang member say, 'I shot a black boy.'"

The Los Angeles Times, citing an anonymous source, also reported that detectives believed the shooting involved a gang of about four Russian robbers.

Coz said the tabloid's tipster helped police find the gun by pointing out the area a few miles from the crime scene where it had been dumped. It was eventually found after a thorough search of the area with help from recruits from the Los Angeles police academy.

On Monday, ballistics experts identified the gun as the weapon used to kill Cosby's son, the New York Daily News reported.

The primary witness was a woman Ennis Cosby apparently was going to visit the night of the slaying. After Cosby got a flat tire, she went to the scene in her car, apparently to illuminate the road.

She later gave police a description of the killer.

• FBI SEEKING PEOPLE SHOWN IN PHOTOS FROM PARK BOMB SITE

ATLANTA — The FBI said Thursday it is trying to find nine people photographed or seen in Centennial Olympic Park just before a deadly bomb exploded during the Olympics last year.

The people are not suspects, but are wanted for questioning because they were in the right place at the right time to have seen something important, said Woody Johnson, special agent in charge of the Atlanta FBI office.

Johnson displayed four photographs at a news conference showing a total of eight people, plus a sketch of another man described by witnesses. The photos were enhanced from videotapes or still photos taken by people in the park that night, he said, adding that agents have analyzed about 1,000 videos and 5,000 photos turned in by the public.

The bomb exploded early July 27 during a concert at the park, killing one woman and injuring more than 100 other people. A cameraman rushing to the explosion died of a heart attack.

The bomb, in a green military-style knapsack, was placed under a bench next to a sound and light tower near the concert stage.

Two of the photos displayed by Johnson showed people carrying what could be military-style knapsacks.

"All we know is that each of these individuals was carrying a backpack in the park during the relevant time frame," he said. "We do not know their names, and we're simply trying to identify them."

"Obviously, because they have backpacks on, we'd like to identify them and talk to them," said Jack Daulton, who heads the FBI task force investigating the bombing.

Ballot gives students chance to voice views

SHANE MCCORMICK
staff writer

Student Senate provided voters with a plebiscite ballot Wednesday that allowed voters to express their opinions about specific issues and possible solutions.

The ballot included issues such as a citywide designated driving service for students, payment of this service through a student fee (75-90 cents per semester) and the current parking problems on campus.

"We just thought this would be the best forum to get a sample of student feedback," Student Body President Chris Hansen said. "These are definitely some areas that students were concerned with, and we wanted to address these issues with this ballot."

One of the biggest concerns voiced by students was the parking problems. This issue was addressed in Plebiscite 2, where four options were provided for the problem: No action, construction of a parking garage, expansion of University Shuttle service or improving bicycle facilities.

The expansion of a University Shuttle Service received the most votes at 39 percent.

Although many thought a shuttle service was the answer, some felt a parking garage was a better alternative.

"The construction of a parking garage would be much more effective," Susan Miller, senior in architectural engineering, said. "Manhattan is growing as a city. "Therefore, the campus of K-State is growing as well. The parking is a problem now. In the relative future, it is just going to get worse."

Brad Yops, sophomore in biology, said he shared the same sentiments about the parking garage.

"The parking garage is really the most efficient solution to this problem," Yops said. "The parking problem is just going to get worse, a parking garage really fits the long-term goal."

The second part of Plebiscite 2 asked whether the students would support the parking garage, knowing it would double the current permit cost of $60 per year.

A majority of the voters, 76 percent, said they would not be in favor of paying for an increased permit.

Also on the ballot was the possible usage of a designated-driving service for students. Sixty percent voted yes for the service, while 36 percent voted against the service. Sixty-three percent said they would be in favor of paying the student fee to support the service.

Hansen said the ballot should help with the administration of future policies.

"Definitely, this will help with future policies," he said. "It helps us get on firmer ground on where the people stand and how we can meet their needs."

Car burglaries deterred through pro-active habits

LILLIAN E. BEEBE
staff writer

Imagine walking out to your car in the morning and finding the driver-side door halfway open and your stereo stolen.

This is exactly what happened to Jason Stallbaumer, freshman in kinesiology.

"I knew I had locked my doors the night before," he said. "My stereo was gone. I walked around to the passenger's side, and the lock had been pried and pushed in."

Stallbaumer also had $500 worth of tools and a radar detector in his vehicle, but these were not taken.

However, Stallbaumer said he doesn't believe the theft to his car was an isolated incident.

"I know of two other people who have had their cars broken into," he said.

Seth Thibault, sophomore in pre-professional business administration, also had his car broken into.

"Another guy realized he had been robbed at the same time the police officer was taking my report," Thibault said.

Lt. Herb Crosby with the Riley County Police Department Investigation Division said there are some suggestions for students wanting to prevent their cars from being broken into.

"Try to park your car in a well-lit, well-traveled area," he said. "Most burglars like to lurk in the dark where they aren't quite as noticeable."

Locking your car helps but is not a deterrent, Crosby said. Make sure to take all valuables inside your home with you or lock them in your trunk at night.

This includes detachable face plates for stereos. Burglars will look in the glove compartment and under the seat to find them and steal the stereo, Crosby said.

Burglars are looking for anything that is marketable, compact and easy to steal, he said. Stereo equipment, radar detectors, cellular phones, credit cards, cash and checks are all targets.

"People purchase high-quality stereo equipment for their cars and put the company decals on their windows. It's a BARAKAH NELSON, a high-school student enrolled in Japanese IV at K-State, will be leaving Sunday for Tokuyama, Japan, where she will be an exchange student.

On the fast track

17-year-old high school student attends K-State

STORY BY CHRISTA CAREY • PHOTO BY BRANDON WHITE

Barbara Nelson told her teen-age daughter that if she worked hard enough, she could start college courses while she was still in high school.

Barakah Nelson made this her goal.

With hard work and determination, she persevered, and was admitted into K-State at the age of 15. Now 17, Barakah Nelson drives a half an hour from Olsburg to Manhattan to attend classes.

She has taken Japanese I, II and III and is currently taking Japanese IV.

"My first semester at K-State I felt young, but now I feel like I pretty much blend in," Barakah Nelson said.

Besides her four-hour class at K-State, Barakah Nelson spends a good deal of time at home working towards her high school diploma.

"Barakah is in home school through the American School. They send her homework, reading assignments and tests through the mail. Barakah works on them, and then she turns them in," Barbara Nelson said.

Barbara Nelson decided to home school her children after elementary school. She said home school was just an option and she opted for it.

When asked if she felt like her daughter was missing any social aspects of high school, Barbara Nelson said she did not believe so. Nor did Angie Fryer, her scout leader.

"Barakah is involved in Girl Scouts and through this organization she has met a lot of girls and has been involved in many community projects," Fryer said.

Barakah became interested in Japan after becoming pen-pals with a Japanese girl when she was 10 years old. Later, her family hosted an American Field Service foreign exchange student from Japan. Barakah decided she wanted to learn the Japanese language, so that was the path she decided to follow at K-State.

"I would like to eventually become a translator for either a Japanese company or an American company that deals with the Japanese," Barakah said.

She said she is unsure if she will contique with K-State after she receives her high-school diploma in May 1998. This is because K-State does not offer Japanese as a major.

Barakah has been considering schools on the East Coast, but has not decided yet.

She is leaving Sunday for Tokuyama, Japan, where she will be an AFS exchange student herself.

"I will be staying with a host family that has three children, a daughter my age and two younger children," Barakah said.

In Japan, she will take classes at a Japanese high school from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m., attending clubs after school.

On top of that, Barakah will have to keep up with her class back at home to get her college credit.

She said she has worked a deal out with her professor.

She will mail Japanese compositions and tapes to fulfill requirements.

Fryer, who is also the area director for AFS, said Barakah received outstanding scholarships for her trip to Japan, besides receiving money through fundraisers she participated in.

"Barakah is an all-American, gorgeous, healthy, athletic blonde who works hard at everything she does," Fryer said.

UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.

Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.

Fortunately, that's a mistake you can avoid with SRAs—tax-deferred annuities from TIAA-CREF. SRAs not only ease your current tax bite, they offer an easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in before-tax dollars, you pay less in taxes now. And since earnings on your SRAs are tax deferred, your money works even harder for you.

What else do SRAs offer? The investment choice, flexibility, and expertise of TIAA-CREF—America's foremost retirement organization.

Why write off the chance for a more rewarding retirement? Stop by your benefits office or call us at 1 800 842-2888 and find out how TIAA-CREF SRAs can help you enjoy many happy returns.

Voter turnout leaves much to be desired, so vote in the runoff

Shame on all of you responsible for the pitiful 12.8 percent turnout for Student Government Association elections this week.

Only about 2,600 of you turned out to vote out of an enrollment of about 20,000. Do we really want to prove the stereotype of Generation Xers not giving a damn about anything? It seems the answer is yes.

Apparently, the majority of you don't care who it is that makes decisions for you at any level — whether it's in Student Senate on Thursday nights or at the Capitol in Topeka.

This apathy has got to go. If you don't support anyone in particular, you should at least vote for the ticket who you consider to be the lesser of the evils.

If you're a senior and you didn't vote because you won't be here next year, please consider the well-being and reputation of your soon-to-be alma mater. Do your part in the run-off election and help elect the ticket you feel will best represent our school.

Kudos to presidential hopefuls Aaron Otto and Tim Riemann and their running mates. Both tickets have addressed the problem of student apathy on campus and have worked to encourage people to vote. Keep up the good work campaigning for a better turnout Wednesday.

Voting for the run-off election for student body president and vice president will take place from 7:30 a.m. to 6 p.m. in the K-State Student Union. You will still need your student ID.

Let's do better this time, folks. Make your voice count.

Term papers made easy with flare... Write or Wrong?

VIEWPOINT

KEN WELLS

KEN WELLS is a graduate student in theater. You can e-mail comments to Ken at (sigma7@ksu.edu).

Welcome to the mid-term funk.

May is now close enough to sniff, and we've still got half a semester left to plow through. Problem is we're besieged by the usual problems — assignments apparently designed to sap the life and soul of those tasked them. There's no way out of it, is there?

Well, if you're going to do a paper (say the standard five-page paper on why specifically you think Hemingway blows chunks), there's no reason you can't do it with a little panache. It'll be relatively more fun to write, and will either be a godsend to your instructor or fuel for his or her retirement drive.

First off, a good rule of thumb that's hammered relentlessly into theater students, specifically actors, is to use the most active verbs possible. Actors derive their stage presence from internalized action, and the more potent the fuel, the harder the dramatic thrust.

If your goal is to lull your instructor into a trance, use passives wherever possible. "The puppy was run over by the Chrysler." If you're trying to capture their attention and hold it at gunpoint, make the verbs pop off the paper. "The Chrysler screamed over the puppy."

When taking the former route of hypnotizing your reader, another good method to use is to weave labyrinthian sentences that your reader will need a compass, map and a Global Positioning System unit to navigate.

Conjunctions are the order of the day here. You will have reached this level when one sentence can span a paragraph of several lines, or, better yet, a page.

Remember, though, that this can qualify as abusing your instructor. Expository writing instructors take it especially hard.

But if you're going for the traditional zip-pow-I-want-these-people-to-be-interested approach to writing, that's much easier. Short, staccato sentences work in moderation. Trust me. They do.

A critical element of a riveting paper is word choice. A thesaurus is your friend or, if you don't have one, a friend is your thesaurus (if you don't have one of those, rent one). Use words that aren't necessarily long but have weight and color to them.

If you're stuck sans friend or thesaurus or would just like a challenge, try incorporating the following words into your next essay, be it on Gertrude Stein or why dead frogs twitch when you jump -start them (or the similarities between the two). They're fun words and, like spices, can add flavor to the most meatloaf of papers.

BILL KRAAI/Collegian

Serendipitous. That's an elegant way of saying stumbled onto. Note that it generally has positive connotations, though — stepping on a rake is rarely serendipitous.

Juicy. Admit it — it gets you all hungry for a nice broccoli, onion and bacon omelette, doesn't it?

Throb. Now there's an action verb.

Hork. I'm told by reliable sources that this is an imported Wisconsin word, as in, "My roommate horked all my Fruity Pebbles." It also can be modified to become an adjective, as in "The 737 is one big horkin' plane."

Swerve. It paints a mental picture, doesn't it? Whether you're talking about literary tendencies or your sister's driving habits, it comes in handy.

Bludgeon. Another active verb, this one is best when used completely out of context. "Our instructor bludgeoned us with homework yesterday."

And don't forget a killer title — the cherry on this essay dessert. If writing about popular fiction and the Greek gods, try "Hit and Myth." Carrier pigeons? "Return to Sender." Fall of the Soviet Union? "Custer Had a Plan, Too."

Above all, a rule of thumb — if you have fun doing something, that spirit will shine through in the final product.

You may not set the literary world on fire, but then, critical arson has its drawbacks, too.

We don't want to burn down a brand-new library, do we?

Hunger strike symbolizes support for Tibetan plight

VIEWPOINT

JEFF CHAN

JEFF CHAN is a graduate student in English. You can e-mail comments to Jeff at (defcon1@ksu.edu)

If you're like me, you probably learned about Tibet from one or another major pop media outlet, like Spin magazine or MTV. Maybe you read about Tibet from notes in a Beastie Boys album, or saw the Tibetan monks on the Lollapalooza tour.

PANG! OK, OK, that wasn't so bad. Maybe if I just concentrate I can finish this column ... PANG!

Ugh. Maybe I can just skip this week ... PANG!

Nope. My editor is insistent. But so is my stomach.

By the time you all read this, I'll be on my third day of fasting. Right now, I'm just worried about the grumblings and growlings emanating from my stomach distracting my students in class. Maybe I should just eat their mid-terms. Problem solved.

PANG!

Actually, I, along with several other Amnesty International members and supporters, am on a symbolic hunger strike in support of the people of Tibet. We are fasting as part of a week's activities centered around the ongoing crisis in Tibet. We are striking to try and bring attention to human rights abuses everywhere.

Monday, March 10, was Tibetan Uprising Day, considered a national holiday among the Tibetan communities-in-exile all over the world. That day marks the anniversary when, in 1959, Tibetans rose up in defiance against continued Chinese consolidation of power in Tibet.

Chinese forces responded with violence, and thousands were killed. The Dalai Lama, the secular and spiritual leader of Tibet, along with thousands of refugees, fled Tibet into India where the Tibetan government-in-exile resides today.

If you're like me, you probably first learned about Tibet from one or another major pop media outlet, like Spin magazine or MTV. Maybe you read about Tibet from notes in a Beastie Boys album, or saw the Tibetan monks on the Lollapalooza tour.

I may have my problems with this cause-of-the-week philosophy, but I can't complain. After all, it got me involved.

Maybe you heard about Tibet for the first time in Wednesday's Collegian, in an outstanding article by John Henderson. Maybe you're reading about it for the first time here, in this column.

I could detail stories about Tibetan friends of mine, and their experiences fleeing the Chinese invaders. I could write about my friend Tsering, who, while in India visiting friends, decided to sneak into Tibet to see his parents. He had previously been arrested in Tibet for passing out pro-independence flyers. After a two-year sentence, he escaped, only to be arrested again during his daring visit.

I, along with other friends in America, waited anxiously for weeks until word finally came that he had been released after three days of being held without charges. His American papers probably saved him.

I could write much about Kalden, who served as an electrician and communications specialist in the Resistance, fighting in Tibet and Nepal. He has deep electricity burns over most of his body from an accident on the run.

The stories go on. What I really want to leave with you are the facts and stats that underlie all these stories and more:

- The People's Republic of China moved into Tibet in the early 1950s, shortly after the Communist revolution. A treaty imposed on the Tibetan government acknowledged sovereignty over Tibet, but allowed for autonomy over internal matters ... all this despite the fact that Tibet was never a part of China, which the Chinese claim.

The two countries had co-existed for hundreds of years in peace, with China defending Tibet militarily and Tibet providing spiritual and intellectual teachings for China's royal courts. All this ended in March of 1959.

- Since the crackdown, some 1.5-million Tibetans — that's one-fifth the population — have died due to Chinese policies. Currently over 600 cases of Tibetan political prisoners are documented, with thousands more believed imprisoned.

Tibetans are considered second-class citizens in their own country and are often the victims of the worst kinds of treatment in prison.

- Over 6,000 monasteries and temples have been destroyed, their Buddhist treasures carried off and either sold or put in museums. The Chinese are systematically rebuilding these temples in faux-style and opening them as tourist attractions.
- The Dalai Lama has drawn up a peace plan that speaks to other abuses. The plan calls for: 1) Transformation of Tibet into a demilitarized zone of peace; 2) abandonment of China's population transfer policy; 3) respect for Tibetan's fundamental human rights; 4) restoration of Tibet's natural environment and abandonment of China's use of Tibet as a test site for nuclear weapons; and 5) commencement of negotiations on future relations between the two countries.

PANG! Geez, almost reached for a granola bar there. Gotta keep going. It's not much, I know, but it's something.

For each pang of hunger I feel, I know it pales in comparison to the hunger felt by some unknown Tibetan prisoner, languishing in a Chinese prison for nothing more than yearning to be free.

The hunger I feel is nothing but a symbolic shadow compared to the hunger for freedom.

• BIRTH CONTROL METHODS EXCLUDE MEN.

Editor,

Perhaps the most disheartening thing about your chart of birth control methods ("The risk factor," March 12) is its lopsidedness.

Of the eight different birth control methods listed in your chart, five of them (pill, implants, DMPA, IUD and diaphragm) are designed for use exclusively by women. Only one (condom) is designed for men.

What's really needed is some sort of male birth control pill that will safely exterminate sperm cells inside a man's body.

• TODD STEWART INSISTS ON CREATING CONTROVERSY.

Editor,

Please, for the love of God, remove Todd Stewart from your payroll.

I cannot stand to read his moronic column every Monday morning.

Does he honestly think anybody cares if he thinks the women's basketball team is pretty? Can't he think of some actual news to write about, instead of insisting on creating controversy every Monday?

Why doesn't he just hand out flyers to people walking across campus that read "Hi. I'm Todd Stewart. I think I am the coolest guy in town. I have been on the radio, so therefore it is true. I have my own column, so therefore it is true. I, alone, changed the way Manny Dies was playing basketball, so therefore it is true. All of the women from the K-State women's basketball team think I am a god since I wrote about how pretty they were."

Maybe he could even have a picture of himself with all of his adoring fans asking for his ever-so-precious autograph. Perhaps if he actually had a sense of humor, instead of taking himself so damn seriously, I might enjoy reading his idiotic ramblings.

Stewart, if everybody here at K-State actually thought that you were as smart about everything, as good at basketball, as wise to the wonders of journalism and as adored by all women as you think you are, well then I guess you could be the king of all media that you try to be.

But I heard you on KXBZ-FM 104.7, and a bigger stuttering, double-talking excuse maker I have never heard. Why don't you just sit down and let somebody else attempt some humor in their column on women's sports.

Or hell, instead of taking on Manny Dies in a little game of hoops, why don't you challenge him to write your column, and trash on you for a couple of Mondays? I'm sure there are a few ladies from Coach Patterson's team that could give him some help in the content.

Now that would be damn amusing.

Kris Emmons
sophomore in art and graphic design

Editor,

Eureka, I've found it!

After attending K-State women's basketball games for five years, I've finally figured out why.

For years I thought it was because the women had talent and played with a level of heart and intensity that the men lacked.

But Todd Stewart helped me see the light. My gosh. The only reason the fans of the women's program have gone is because the players look good! Who da thunk it?

Thank you, Todd, you pinhead. After the fiasco that was last season, getting used to a new coaching style, making it to the Big 12 Championship game and getting a seed in the final tournament, I'm sure Coach Deb Patterson, her staff and the players were relieved to know that you — Todd Stewart — approved of how they look.

It is amazing what raging hormones and a little whipped cream, will do to bring a man around. Stewart, I'm glad you finally made it to a game, (although a little late) and I hope that your seat on the bandwagon is a comfy one.

To the women on the team, congratulations on a great season and good luck in the Big Dance.

Some of us won't be able to go to the games, but our hearts will be with you.

Ian Markley
senior in pre-journalism and mass communications

Editor,

I am writing in response to the recent coverage of the K-State women's basketball team. I was upset to read an error on the front page of the Friday issue of the Collegian that stated that Tamecka Dixon played for K-State. Dixon plays for the University of Kansas — at least give the K-State women's team the respect they have fought so hard for these past few weeks!

I thought I'd let that error slide, but then I was even more appalled when I read an column written by Todd Stewart on Monday. I could not believe Stewart wrote the entire column on the team's physical appearance, ignoring their athletic ability and accomplishments entirely.

Yes, the women of the K-State basketball team are attractive, but that is not important. I cannot speak for Missy Decker, but I would think that she did not invite Stewart to watch them play just so he could write a column on how "photos don't do Jones any justice," or so he would beg them for a date.

Stewart failed to mention a single highlight from the game he saw. I wonder if he can even remember any, or if he was too busy drooling over the players.

Yes, Stewart, there is nothing sexist about saying a woman is attractive, but there is something sexist about writing an entire sports column and not mentioning a single moment of the game.

To the K-State women's basketball team, I am proud of the way you have played this season. Congratulations on making it to the NCAA tournament! I will be cheering you on all the way, not for how you look, but for your tremendous effort, dedication and skill.

• FREEDOM OF SPEECH DIFFERS FROM FREEDOM TO IMPOSE BELIEFS ON OTHERS.

Editor,

The battle for America is taking place not only in the legislature and in the media., but its also taking place now in mailboxes across our country.

This week, millions of Americans received a "Christian Bill of Rights" for us to sign and return to Jerry Falwell, so he could deliver them to our elected officials in Washington. A quick look through the five points in this document makes it abundantly clear why this battle has become ridiculous and not worthy of the bizarre attention the media pay to Falwell and friends.

The first point in this document demands exercise of religion (read Christian religion) in public schools, even though the accompanying letter admits that less than a quarter of Americans are evangelical Christians like Falwell.

The second says they don't believe in abortion. But the religious beliefs of less than 25 percent of Americans hardly make a basis for legislation, do they? The third point says they believe in heterosexual marriage. The fourth point says they believe in the Bible. The fifth point asks the president and Congress to ask God to bless us.

How can a list of the beliefs from one religion — in this country of many religions — be a bill of rights? Beliefs are not rights. They're just beliefs.

Our Constitution, the highest authority in the land — higher than popular opinion, by the way — says we are all free to believe what we want, but it does not say we are free to act on our beliefs if they interfere with other Americans' rights.

School prayer robs some Americans of their freedom from religion, especially from one force-fed, state-endorsed religion, which is what Falwell wants.

Beliefs about abortion, gay Americans and the definition of morality are religious issues, and they belong in church and in private homes, not in the legislature and not in strangers' homes.

I don't know why this debate goes on. It all comes down to one simple idea. Falwell and his followers already have a Bill of Rights, the same one we all enjoy.

They are free to believe anything they want, but they are not free — and never will be — to impose those beliefs on others. It doesn't take a rocket scientist, or even a preacher, to understand that.

• SHANE MCCORMICK NEEDS TO RESEARCH HIS FACTS.

Editor,

Shane McCormick's column about the NCAA Tournament and his personal picks sure did reveal how little he knows about college basketball and March Madness.

McCormick did have a couple of accurate statements in his column, but there is one glaring statement that he should have know about. Anyone who claims to be able to pick upsets and winners should know that Utah is not a No. 5 seed in the West region.

If Shane had taken the time and effort to write an informative column about the tournament, he would have surely watched the selection show, or ESPN's "Sports Center," and he would have known Utah is a No. 2 seed in the West and not a No. 5 seed, as the Collegian mistakenly put them.

The Collegian can be excused for their error because the task of proofreading is very difficult and one that I would not want to undertake, but for McCormick to not do his own research on this topic is inexcusable and just goes to show that the writers in the sports section do not know what they are writing about.

McCormick should take pride in doing something that nearly every sports fan would like to do — write their opinions on sports. He and others should research what they are going to write on so they will not make the obvious mistakes I see in the sports section with great frequency.

• COLLEGIAN HAS PROBLEMS WITH ACCURACY WHEN WRITING ABOUT THEATER.

Editor,

The Collegian may very well be an award-winning newspaper, and I remain impressed with many aspects of it.

However, after four years of observing your treatment of the music, theater and dance departments, I cannot understand why such a good newspaper maintains such low standards of reporting on and reviewing our stage productions.

Is there simply nobody over there who is informed on the arts? Is there nobody who can teach student journalists how to write an informed, intelligent review? Nobody who checks to make sure the dates and times presented are correct? Nobody who knows the difference between a song and a sonata, a comedy and a satire, or modern dance from ballet?

Stage productions here at K-State are incredible affairs. Our valiant, brilliant people in both the set and costume shops put in unbelievable hours to give us fantastic settings for our staged productions.

The actors, singers and dancers work for months to put together a polished production, and the production staff work themselves to exhaustion to keep everything running. It's a lot of work, but we do it willingly.

And then the Collegian can come along with misinformation and clueless opinions, and nobody will come to see the show.

I know the Collegian staff works hard. I appreciate the many articles that you do on our productions and the way that you try to go behind the scenes and find the people who work there.

I'm not saying that you do these things on purpose, with some sort of vendetta against the arts. I understand accidents happen, that sometimes the only person available to write a story is someone who has never heard an opera and doesn't know Johann Sebastian Bach from Johann Strauss.

What I'm trying to say is that we depend on you to get the story straight. You are our link with the students; if it weren't for the Collegian, most of the students on campus would have no idea that a show even existed, much less when it was being produced. We are, frankly, in your hands.

It's an incredible responsibility, isn't it? Please think about it. If the Collegian prints that the opera is only running for one night, who among the "general public" students will know that this is incorrect? If the Collegian prints the wrong time or place for a production, fewer students will show up at the right time or right place. It has happened in the past. I pray it will no longer happen in the future.

I have no way of commanding you, of ordering you do make changes and get things right the first time. I can only ask — I can only beg. Please, be more careful. Please, double-check the dates and times. Please, learn that a review is more than "It was good and I liked it" or "It was bad and I hated it." Please, learn. Please, teach.

• IMPLICATIONS OF CLONING ARE EXAGGERATED.

Editor,

While cloning is definitely a big deal scientifically, it should not be a big deal ethically. Cloning is just another method of giving birth. Period. All this talk about recreating another Hitler or Einstein is baloney. While genetic characteristics such as height, hair color or sexual orientation may mirror the original, the thoughts and ideas of a clone will not. They are unique to each person. We have nothing to fear.

I think one day we will look back and laugh at what all the fuss was about.

• LAW ABIDING CITIZENS HAVE RIGHT TO CARRY CONCEALED WEAPONS.

Editor,

In the column "Concealed-weapon bill opens up world of possibilities" from the March 6 Collegian, Valeri Crenshaw seems to be implying that anyone who would exercise his right to carry a concealed firearm, if this bill becomes law, is a criminal.

For that matter, she seems to be implying that firearm owners in general are criminals waiting for an opportunity.

There are two points I would like to make. First, most firearm owners obtain and own their firearms legally. They would only carry them when and where the law allows, if at all.

Second, individuals who would do any of the things stated in her column would already be carrying their firearms with no regard for existing laws or any law that might be passed.

While it is true that passage of this bill will not solve all of our problems, it will allow the people who decide to carry a concealed weapon to feel more secure while giving the real criminals something to think about before their next crime.

Crenshaw's article illustrates a problem I fear plagues many people today. Her response to the possible passage of the concealed-carry bill seemed to be purely emotional.

Unfortunately, until people on both sides of any of today's social and political issues begin to act based on reason rather than emotion, very few will be resolved.

• GREATER IMPORTANCE SHOULD BE PLACED ON FARRELL LIBRARY.

Editor,

We read a lot in this newspaper about the status of our athletic teams and their importance to the University. Of even greater significance to all students (not just the few gifted athletes for whom a successful college team means entree into the professional ranks) is the plight of Farrell Library. The library is essential to attract and retain excellent faculty. (The corresponding justification for a coliseum and stadium is universally recognized).

Despite an article in the Dec. 5, 1996 Collegian on the latest library triage, we think most are not aware of the gravity of the situation. Inadequate state funding only partially explains the tragic state of our library.

Five percent of an annual University budget is considered minimal support (about what the University of Kansas spends).

For many years, K-State has spent about 2.5 percent. It subscribes to only 8,800 magazines (University of Colorado to 29,500), and ranks about 10th in subscriptions in the Big 12.

It is far too small and underfunded to qualify for membership in the Association of Research Libraries. (What if we couldn't qualify for Division I-A football?)

The latest threat, concurrent with $500,000 in journal cancellations, is the mistaken belief that the traditional library is obsolete and that only electronic information is worth paying for. When the first automobile became viable late last century, horses were not rounded up and shot.

We would like to urge students individually and through their government to become indignant over these policies which devalue K-State and their degrees.

Student activism was instrumental in turning around a misguided administration (saving Nichols gymnasium from demolition) and in overcoming its indifference and mobilizing support (for the enlargement of Farrell Library).

How ironic that this beautiful new building, which earlier students taxed themselves to help finance for future generations, may become just an expensive tombstone.

Do these far-sighted students fight for adequate book and journal funding?

Do we really need another vice-associate-sub-"dean of student life," or do you feel you can manage your own life and would prefer such funds be "diverted to a library our first-class athletic teams need-n't be ashamed of?

For perspective, the salary of such a position would fund over 60 percent of the scientific journals the mathematics department needs to do its job.

After this heavy use of sports metaphors, the first author feels compelled to point out his own undergraduate experience involved an unusually beneficial relationship between athletics and academics. At Notre Dame, football revenue financed half the buildings on campus from 1920 to 1950.

TUSCALOOSA, Ala. — Although the K-State women's basketball team's first-round NCAA game is tonight, K-State coach oach Deb Patterson is looking at St. Joseph's as a team similar to her own.

"This St. Joseph's team is very much like us," Patterson said. "They play a variety of defenses. They are a perimeter-oriented team, which isn't like us, but they play a controlled half-court offense. They make good decisions with the ball."

The Hawks play a style of basketball not comparable to any Big 12 team, senior forward Andria Jones said.

"A lot of the Big 12 teams are more post-oriented," Jones said. "Trying to compare them to teams in the Big 12 is hard, because I can't think of any that play like them."

Patterson said the Hawks' post game is admirable as well.

"St. Joseph's has a potent perimeter game, but they can also hold their own in the post," Patterson said.

"This game is a much different style of play than we're used to, and that is why I think it will be a good match-up."

The center of the Hawks' perimeter shooting comes from forward Megan Compain.

Compain is sixth in the nation in three-point field-goal percentage, shooting 44 percent from behind the arc. Compain was also named MVP of the Atlantic 10 tournament, which the Hawks won.

The Hawks have been on a 17-game winning streak, but their only win against a top-25 team during that streak was the victory over George Washington. Patterson said this gives the Cats a definite advantage.

"We've had that experience of lining up against ranked teams repeatedly in the last few weeks, with two of our wins last week being against top-20 teams," Patterson said.

Because an NCAA victory means just another game, Patterson hangs no special meaning on the matchup with the Hawks.

"We take this game as the next game we have to prepare for," Patterson said. "We don't even talk about the fact that we're in the tournament — we know that. We're approaching this game like every other opponent we've faced — what are the two or three things we need to do to beat this team?"

However, Jones said practice has been no less intense, and the main focus of Thursday's practice was defense.

The Cats rank second in the Big 12 in scoring defense, holding their opponents to an average 58.1 points a game.

The Hawks were first in the Atlantic 10, allowing only 56 points, and in the latest rankings were sixth in the nation.

"Nobody's taking this lightly," Jones said. "The coaches want to keep the level of intensity up during our practices."

Senior point guard Missy Decker said the team's Big 12 tournament performance proved the Cats can handle pressure down the stretch.

"We've constantly gotten better this season," Decker said. "Being here is a culmination of a goal that Coach brought in the year."

Patterson said the goal was reached sooner than she's expected.

"Being in the NCAA tournament was more of a long-term than a short-term goal," Patterson said.

"That's just evidence of how this team has adapted and worked hard this season."

Jones adamant about season thus far, continues to collect accolades after season

SUN DEE MILLS
staff writer

Senior forward Andria Jones might be living, eating and breathing basketball right now, but next year, Jones will been looking into living, eating and breathing alone for the first time in her college career.

"I've lived with basketball players since my freshman year," Jones said. "I've thought about living on my own, and I'm like, yes and no."

Jones has been busy earning numerous honors over the past two weeks, and the list is growing longer than a deep three-point shot.

After being named first team all-Big 12, Jones helped her team reach the Big 12 championship game. She was named to the all-tournament team and given MVP honors.
Monday, she found out she made the honorable mention Associated Press all-American list.

The next day, she was chosen as one of 40 Kodak all-American candidates. The 10-member Kodak all-American team will be named during the women's Final Four in Cincinnati.

"It's a big honor," Jones said. "I may not show much emotion about it, but that's because I think it hasn't sunk in yet."

Jones, an education major, plans to do her student teaching in Manhattan in the fall and finish her undergraduate degree. Then, she plans to attend graduate school or play in the women's professional leagues.

"I've never thought about it seriously until the past two weeks," Jones said of the professional leagues. "I look at these players, and I think I'm not as athletic or as big as they are. I don't fit in with their kind of playing. I don't know where I'd fit in in the league."

Deb Patterson, women's basketball coach, has said as a small forward, Jones could be successful in the ABL or WNBA. Jones said she would need to improve some of her fundamentals.

"I'd have to work on my ball-handling skills," she said. "If that's what it took, I would do that."

Although admitting hesitantly to considering the possibility of being recruited to play in the pros, Jones said it was something she would think about.

"My dad said, 'Andria, if somebody offered you money to play basketball, you wouldn't do it?' So told him, 'I guess you're right. It's something I would look into.'"

Jones said she wasn't sure she would have time to devote to hanging out with roommates, but life without four-year roommate and K-State guard Kjersten Larson would be strange.

"We know how each other react to being picky about having things clean or leaving things out in the kitchen," Jones said. "We just know because we've lived together so long."

Larson said being Jones' roommate has been fun and a learning experience.

"Andria's a great girl," Larson said. "She's taught me a great deal — in basketball and in life in general."

Teammates make great roommates because they know what you're going through at all

TARA WRAY

TARA WRAY is a sophomore in print journalism. You can e-mail comments to Tara at (twray@ksu.edu).

I'm sick. I do not know what I have, but I generally don't feel good, so have pity on my frazzled nerves and read my column.

Hey, this means you!

I did not want to be stuck in a dimly lit cesspool of human infection on a beautiful Wednesday afternoon writing this column.

However, due to reader demand, which I am just certain would have ensued to a riotous boiling point if I managed to miss one week of my column this semester, I will, in the inspiring words of Jimmy V., never give up.

At least not until I spew out another clever and insightful sports related masterpiece (for those of you who are not quite sure, this is known as blatant sarcasm), then I will go home and sleep for a month.

In spite of a violent cough that would elicit sympathy from even Mother Teresa (but not my co-workers!), I am here in this stale 'ol newsroom writing this column for you — my two loyal readers! I hope you appreciate it.

It is such a beautiful day, almost beautiful enough to forget about that massive research paper due the day after spring break. Why, it is beautiful enough to forget all about reality and turn on the tube to the soothing sounds of college basketball from now until the end of March.

I would love to be in bed right now, a Seven-Up in one hand and a remote in the other, watching KU wallop Jackson State.

Or perhaps, more importantly, listening to the K-State women's basketball team weave their way through the NCAA bracket (despite their striking beauty, the game will not be televised).

Yes, today is a momentous day for K-State athletics. For the first time in 10 years, the women's basketball team is playing in the NCAA Tournament.

It may be my fever causing hallucinations, but I foresee grand things for the lady hoopsters. None of which include dates with strikingly handsome members of the Collegian sports staff.

If only for one win or possibly two, the Cats will reap the benefits of their trip to the Big Dance for years to come. Welcome to the other K-State basketball — a side people will now care all about.

As for the game at hand, down there in 'Bama the Cats will be evenly matched against seventh seeded St. Joseph's in first round play of the NCAA tournament.

It will be interesting to see the outcome as teeny tiny St. Joseph's struggles to gain big time respect at the Big Dance.

Playing in the tournament for the first time since 1989, the St. Joseph's don't-you-dare-call-us-Lady-Hawks have amassed a 25-4 overall record (15-1 in their conference), not to mention an Atlantic 10 championship and a 17-game winning streak this season.

Sounds impressive, huh? Well, do not count the Cats out yet. Stats do not mean much come tipoff.

Despite an upset over George Washington in the Atlantic 10 championship, the Hawks have not faced a barrage of quality opponents this season.

Look for a man-to-man defense by the Hawks as they try to stifle K-State's big guns, Andria Jones and Brit Jacobson who together account for a large chunk of the Wildcat offense.

With team camaraderie (and much praise from the media), K-State has momentum rolling behind them. Plus, we have already beaten one team of Hawks this season, why not another?

K-State 65, St. Joseph's 58.

The second round will also not be televised — something about an incredibly ugly Alabama team — but stay close to a radio as the Cats will battle the Crimson Tide in the NCAA Tournament part two.

Sadly, Alabama might put an end to K-State's Cinderella season. Boasting a starting lineup that includes four third team All-Americans, 'Bama, in all likelihood will blast apart K-State's rags to riches dream. They have been called by some a likely Final Four team.

Do not despair though, by this time next year the Cats will hopefully be back at the Big Dance, fox-trotting their way to the Final Four.

As for this season, bask in the beauty of the Cats first NCAA berth in 10 years. Bask in the beauty of a NCAA win. Bask in the beautiful job Deb Patterson and the rest of the team did this season.

But by all means, do not bask in my direction. I look like something the Wildcat drug in.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

Beyond luck and leprechauns

STORY BY HANG NGUYEN
ART BY MATT HAWKINS

There's more to St. Patrick than getting pinched and wearing green

When people think of St. Patrick's Day, people think green — green leprechauns, green three-leaf clovers, green parades, parties and painful pinches that eventually turn purple and green.

But who was St. Patrick? And what do leprechauns, clovers and pinches have to do with the missionary credited with converting the Irish to Christianity?

Born around 373 A.D., St. Patrick was British, not Irish.

St. Patrick wasn't always St. Patrick. His real name was believed to be Maewyn Succat. He took on Patrick, or Patricus, after he became a priest.

At the age of 16, this nobleman's son was kidnapped by pirates and sold into slavery in Ireland where he worked as a shepherd. Christianity had meant nothing to him until he began having religious visions during his six-year captivity.

During one of his talks with God, he began:

"Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name ... "

Today, these words have become known as "The Lord's Prayer."

Voices from one of his visions instructed him to escape to France on a getaway ship. After doing so, he became a priest in France and later a bishop.

When he was about 60 years old, he returned to the pagan Ireland to spread Christianity. There, he used the shamrock, which resembles a three-leaf clover, as a metaphor to explain the concept of the Trinity with the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit.

By the time he died in Ireland on March 17, about 460 A.D., he had baptized tens of thousands and established hundreds of churches throughout the land.

St. Patrick's biography explains the origins of the clover and the color green, representing spring, clovers and Ireland. But his life story leaves leprechauns, pinches, parades and Blarney Stones unexplained.

In America, the first St. Patrick's Day parade was celebrated in Boston in 1737. Today the largest parade is held in New York City.

Leprechauns are Irish fairies. They're small, about 2 feet tall, look like old men and are often dressed like shoemakers with cocked hats and leather aprons. They live alone and spend their time making shoes. Treasure hunters, looking for the leprechaun's pot of gold, follow the sounds of the shoemaker's hammer.

Contrary to popular belief, they're not nice like the Lucky Charms guy. In legends, leprechauns are actually mean, tricky little creatures that disappear when treasure hunters take their eyes off them.

Speaking of little creatures, pinches are a childhood tradition in which children pinch classmates who aren't wear green. Wearing green is believed to be one of the symbols of good luck on St. Patrick's Day.

Another symbol of luck is the four-leaf clover on the holiday, which doubles the amount of luck usually associated with the clovers.

The final way to be lucky is to kiss the Blarney Stone set in the wall of the Blarney Castle in the Irish village of Blarney. Kissing the stone is supposed to bring the kisser the gift of persuasive eloquence.

Built in 1446 by Cormac Laidhiv McCarthy, the castle wall is 18-feet thick. Needless to say, the stone is not easy to reach. Because it is in the main castle wall and the parapet, kissers have to lie on their back and bend backward and downward, holding iron bars for support.

For those tempted to go searching for the Blarney Stone, just think — people's lips have been all over it for 500 years, not to mention the possibility of death.

The three myths of Saint Patrick

- The shamrock. According to legend, St. Patrick used the plant with the three leaves to explain the Holy Trinity to the Irish.
- Banishing of snakes. St. Patrick supposedly drove all the snakes off the Emerald Isle.
- Christianity. The conversion of Ireland from paganism to Christianity is credited to St. Patrick.

Manhattan prepares for weekend as celebrants look to get lucky

KIM BRUNA
staff reporter

The luck of the Irish will be in the Little Apple this weekend as Manhattan prepares to celebrate St. Patrick's Day.

Activities will kick off at 11 a.m. with a parade in Aggieville. The parade will include clowns, cars, the K-State Marching Band, the Marching Cougars from Kansas City, Mo., as well as K-State athletes.

Prizes awarded for parade entries will include $100 for the largest group and a $100 Lucky BrewGrille gift certificate for the wackiest K-State group. The Marching Cougars will perform after the parade in front of The Palace in Aggieville.

With last year's overwhelming turnout, the Aggieville Business Association is looking forward to a good one this year as well, said Cheryl Sieben, executive director of the Aggieville Business Association.

"Last year we lined the streets," Sieben said. "If the sun is out, we will expect a better turnout than last year."

Even though snow has been forecast with temperatures threatening to dip below freezing, Sieben said not to worry.

"Rain or shine, we're gonna have a celebration," Sieben said.

The St. Pat's Road Race will begin at 12:30 p.m. The first race will be the Shamrock two-mile Fun Run.

It will be followed at 1:15 p.m. by the St. Pat's 10K Road Race and three-mile Leprechaun Walk. An awards ceremony and barbecue will follow at 2:45 p.m. More than 300 prizes will be awarded.

The fourth annual Pot of Gold Contest will be sponsored by the Aggieville merchants. Individuals paying 25 cents will receive a list of participating merchants. Entrants who go to a store and say they saw a pot of gold will have their sheet stamped. At the end of the contest, entrants will be put together and winners will be drawn randomly. Proceeds from this event will go to the Boys & Girls Club of Manhattan.

If you want to get lucky this St. Patrick's Day, go to TW Longhorns. KXBZ-104.7 and Longhorns will be co-sponsoring a Kiss-A-Thon. Beginning at 1 p.m., couples will begin kissing on the dance floor. The last couple left kissing will receive a trip to Nashville, Tenn. The trip consists of three days and two nights in Nashville, including hotel and tickets for other activities. Five or six couples are expected to participate, but Hoss Michaels, program director for the radio station, said he has no idea how long the contest could last.

"I don't know," Michaels said. "A radio station in Kansas City has done this before, and it went 10 hours, but that was for a car. But the trip is really good."

Renovations to Moore Hall lobby postponed

CHRISTA CAREY
staff reporter

Moore Hall residents will have to wait at least another year before they see renovation in the r residence hall lobby.

The proposed make-over was scheduled to occur this month. However, inadequate funds canceled the plans.

"Students in the Hall Governing Board association are pretty upset about the postponing of repairs," Jason Linenberger, sophomore in business administration and chief justice of HGB, said.

Linenberger said members of HGB were looking forward to some upgrades for Moore Hall.

"It's almost embarrassing to see prospective students touring Moore Hall and notice them looking at chipping paint or broken ceiling tiles," Linenberger said.

> It's almost embarrassing to see prospective students touring Moore Hall and notice them looking at chipping paint and broken ceiling tiles.
> • Jason Linenberger
> Moore Hall HGB

Chuck Werring, director of housing and dining services, said that although Moore Hall will not receive renovation, the building will get a thorough cleaning this summer.

Werring said that every summer the buildings that are not being used for summer classes, camps and conferences are given a good cleaning. This summer's repairs will include filter cleanings in the air conditioners, replacing ceiling tiles and partitions in the bathrooms, repairing pipes, painting, refurbishing furniture and carpeting hallways and lobbies.

"Housing and dining services has signed a contract with an elevator company and in the next three years they will be upgrading all residence hall elevators by replacing motors and cables," Werring said.

Jacob Jansonius, sophomore in public relations, said the reason he was leaving Moore Hall after a two-year living experience was the cost of living.

"I expect to get what I pay for, and I feel like I'm not," Jansonius said.

With the cost of residence halls increasing in the fall, Jansonius said he felt like he should be getting more for his money. He said the benefits for Moore Hall do not outweigh the costs.

Linenberger said the returning rate for Moore Hall has not been good due to lack of renovations other residences have or are receiving.

Recently suites were built into Boyd, Marlatt, Goodnow, Haymaker and West halls.

Ford just received a new lobby and Goodnow and Marlatt now have individual showers where communal showers once were.

"I feel like it's Moore's turn for some repairs. But, for now, everyone will have to wait," Linenberger said.

Music Review

The sweet sounds of ska filled Bombers Upstairs on Tuesday night, when three ska bands graced the stage in a concert that left the crowd wanting more and more.

St. Louis ska kings MU330 headlined the show, with local boys Ruskabank and O'Phil from Winfield filling out the bill.

O'Phil hit the stage a little after 10 p.m. and kicked their set off with their dynamic, skanked-out cover of Guns N' Roses' hit "Paradise City." They hit the stage running and rocked Bombers at a breakneck pace until they finished their last song, "Ska Yo Yo."

Nick Baur, Rob Bell and Gerry Lundquist of MU330's horn section joined O'Phil during "Ska Yo Yo" to provide an extra horn punch.

Vocalist Alex Thomas was all over the place, jumping up and down and dancing across the stage. His vocals were great. A highlight of O'Phil's set was their cover of a Buddy Holly song. Their horn section was top-notch with solos galore.

They plan on releasing a follow-up to their 1996 "Activator" compact disc within the next few months.

Manhattan's own Ruskabank occupied the middle slot of the evening, and played a lengthy set of originals.

During their set, there was quite a bit of crowd surfing and stage diving by members of the crowd.

Ruskabank was in top form as they just cranked through their set, not stopping much at all to take a breath between songs. They worked the packed house into a dancing frenzy by kicking out all the crowd favorites, including "Hothead" and "Ska On Da Radio."

The crowd loved Ruskabank, and it was sad to see a lot of the crowd leave as soon as they left the stage.

Look for Ruskabank's 7-inch single out within a couple months on Damphool Records.

ROB BELL, trombonist for MU330, plays to a big crowd Tuesday night at Bombers. The St. Louis-based band played with O'Phil and Ruskabank.

Closing the evening out were the wacky chumps on parade, band members of MU330.

They have experienced a bit of a lineup change in the past few months. Vocalist Jason Nelson had to leave the band recently, so guitarist Dan Potthast has taken over lead vocals. They also added Gerry Lundquist on trombone from Skankin' Pickle, and trumpet player Nick Baur is leaving the band.

Lundquist is on loan from Skankin' Pickle for MU330's upcoming European tour starting April 1.

MU330 also recently released a limited edition of 1,000 7-inch singles on clear vinyl, via Moon Ska Records. It features two brand new, unreleased songs.

They blasted through a 24-song set and played both old crowd favorites and new songs as well. The set consisted mostly of songs from their recent Dill Records release, "Chumps On Parade," and new, unreleased songs.

The new songs are excellent indicators of MU330's power and force.

Potthast and bassist Chris Diebold assumed glam-rock poses and occasional guitar solos a la Motley Crue or Poison, much to the delight of the crowd.

Lundquist, for being a brand new member of the band, played amazingly. He also stomped around the stage like a professional wrestler and tore his shirt off, which had many in the crowd laughing.

It was a bit unusual to not have Nelson fronting the band, but Potthast did a more than adequate job covering his vocals. Many times, he sounded much like Nelson did.

MU330 ended their set with their hit, if you will, "Hoosier Love." They invited members of the crowd on stage to dance and sing, and then they were done.

It was really great to see that many people at a show in Manhattan, and it looks like promoter Jeff Fortier, from Avalanche Productions in Lawrence, will bring more ska shows to Manhattan in the near future.

IGUANAS AND SALMONELLA

Cases of salmonella linked to iguanas have risen sharply along with the reptiles' popularity as pets. The number of iguana-linked salmonella infections in people has climbed from one reported case in 1989 to 67 in 1995, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported in the March issue of the journal Pediatrics.

Salmonella can lead to meningitis and other serious complications, especially in infants. A 3-year-old Indiana boy died of salmonella apparently caused by his family's iguana.

The researchers studied 32 cases of iguana-linked salmonella reported in 1994. Twenty-six of the cases were in infants. All but one had diarrhea, a common symptom of salmonella, which also can cause abdominal cramps and fever.

Stovall talks about waiting game for court ruling on predator law

JILL JARSULIC
staff reporter

In the eyes of Kansas Attorney General Carla Stovall, the Sexually Violent Predator Law is a great example of democracy and the way the legal system is supposed to work.

Stovall

Stovall was in Manhattan Thursday to speak to the Manhattan Rotary Club.

"No matter what the court decides, the system worked, and this is the best example I can tell anyone about," she said.

Stovall spoke about her recent experience defending Kansas' Sexually Violent Predator Law in front of the U.S. Supreme Court during the Rotary Club's lunch meeting Thursday.

"In 1993, a young woman was killed. Her parents went to the legislature, and got a law passed. They were not rich. They were not famous. They are not elected officials," she said. "They were just people that had a cause, and they made the legislature understand that cause."

Sexual offenders had been committed under the law, but the Kansas Supreme Court struck down the law as unconstitutional.

"Within 3-1/2 years, the U.S. Supreme Court took the Kansas case," Stovall said.

Stovall said she and her team are now playing a waiting game to find out how the high court will decide.

"It will be another couple of months before we have the decision," she said. "If they uphold the law, then we will continue business as usual."

Two individuals have been committed since the appeal to the Supreme Court began, and Stovall said those proceedings will continue until the outcome of the case is decided.

Students showcase female slave voices through literature, performances

BECKY WINTER
staff reporter

K-State students will bring historical slave voices to life at 3 p.m. Sunday in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

"Voices of the Past" will showcase literature written and performed by K-State students about black women during the time of slavery.

"The purpose of this event is to celebrate the experiences of African American woman during a time of turmoil in our country," Olga Davis, assistant professor of speech, said.

The program was developed out of the course, The Rhetoric of Black Female Narratives, offered in the speech department, Davis said.

"I wanted these students to understand their rhetorical discourse and the power of the written and spoken word in history," Davis said.

Todd Nicewonger, junior in speech and American ethics, will perform in the show. He said he thought this is a good way to understand the history of African American women in slavery.

"We studied the artifacts in class and then applied that by creating narratives so that they could express themselves. I think this will make it easier for the audience to comprehend what it was really like, instead of just being numbed by all of the information," Nicewonger said.

Rhonda Lee, senior in electronic media, will also perform in the show. Lee said she hoped the audience will gain a better understanding of the differences between black and white women.

"This is a chance to compare and contrast both sides of black and white women. The experiences are so different, and I think it is unfair to lump them together," she said.

Davis said she thought the show will be important because it deals with issues that continue today.

"Even though the performance is set in the 19th century, the questions are ones that will continue into the 20th century. We need to reflect, and I hope that is what the audience does with these performances," Davis said.

"We should never forget the history of the 19th century. We need to realize that the history of African Americans is a history that all Americans can and should embrace, because it informs us of the resilience of the human race."

Committee strips budget for education $150 million

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — It was just too inviting a target for conservatives on the House Appropriations Committee.

The committee decided Thursday to strip more than $150 million in additional spending for public schools from its proposed budget for the state's 1998 fiscal year, which begins July 1.

On Thursday, it reviewed its work and put the finishing touches on a single bill containing the entire $7.8 billion budget for fiscal 1998.

Removed from the budget were:

• $115.3 million in additional state funds for public schools, to offset lost revenues from reducing the state's 35-mill property tax levy for schools.

• $13.1 million to pay for an increase in the base budget for public schools from $3,648 per pupil to $3,670.

• $9.8 million in additional aid to school districts with more than 1,800 students.

• $6 million in aid to school districts with declining student enrollments.

• $6 million in extra spending on programs for students considered at risk of dropping out of school.
